Mr. LONG. I will take either ruling the Senate wants to make, if the Senate will just tell me which one. First, if the Senate says I should take the responsibility and not try to justify my position, then I will stand on that ruling; and, second, if the Senate will tell me I must justify it, I will stand on that ruling; but do not try to catch me between the two horns of the dilemma, with the Senator from Pennsylvania saying, "If you attempt to justify it, then, that makes me a judge of the matter"; and another Senator saying, "If you do not justify it, then, there is no ground for rejecting the nomination." I will take either one that is desired.

If I am told to justify the charges, there is not any question about it. I have read from the newspapers, and another Senator on this floor tells what he knows about it. The charges are not anonymous. I knew these facts before I left New Orleans; I telephoned down there and had them checked up by many good, responsible, reliable citizens of that city.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure the Senator will give me a frank reply to this inquiry—

Mr. LONG. I will try to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the Senator stated that he proposes to make objection to every nomination made by President Roosevelt for office in Louisiana in connection with which he was not consulted?

Mr. LONG. I have not made any such statement, and I do not make any such statement now.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. Let me complete the answer; then I will yield to the Senator from Virginia. I have not made such a statement. Unfortunately, Mr. President, the President has sent in two appointments that no white politician or black politician could fail to call attention to in the Senate. Unfortunately, most unfortunately, in connection with this appointment there was another appointment sent here for United States attorney whose name appears on a prospectus in a swindling scheme throughout the United States, through which $6,000,000 were filched, largely from poor people, who were robbed of everything they had, under a representation that they were building a bridge connecting a United States highway when, as a matter of fact, they were building one to compete with a bridge on a United States highway. I had to oppose that appointment.

I am sorry the Senator brings in anything about the Roosevelt matter. This question cannot be settled on that basis, because this man Sullivan was a member of the delegation opposing Roosevelt at the Chicago convention. Sullivan got up a rump convention; it was his crowd that was at Chicago to unseat me and all other Roosevelt delegates. So let us not drag that issue into the question at all. I do not urge that as a point. Of course, we gave our money and have not got any left and Sullivan gets the jobs. But that is not the point. I am just presenting the facts in whatever light the Senate may want to view them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and appreciate his feeling that his subcommittee was not treated courteously or fairly in this matter. I also agree with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], now that grave charges have been made, without, however, any adequate testimony to sustain them so far, in my judgment, the nomination ought to go back to the committee and let the Senator from Louisiana appear before the committee and substantiate his charges. The charges he has made so far do not appeal to me at all. The idea of talking about defeating the confirmation of a nomination for collector of internal revenue because he was a "tramp" printer is most astonishing to me. Benjamin Franklin was a "tramp" printer.

Mr. LONG. I have not objected to the nomination on that ground.

Mr. GLASS. And if I could not have gotten work in my town, I would have been a "tramp" printer, because tramp printers go up and down, getting work wherever they may. That is not an adequate charge to lodge against the confirmation of a man nominated to be collector of internal revenue in New Orleans or anywhere else.

If the Senator from Louisiana can substantiate his charges that this man is an intimate associate of gamblers and that gamblers have placed in this office unworthy men, I think the Senate ought to know that. If the Senator from Louisiana can go before the committee and substantiate that charge, I think the committee ought to hear him. But I think the Senator from Louisiana ought to have gone before the committee long ago and substantiated that charge if he could prove it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. In just a moment. I want to say that I agree with all the Senator from Virginia has said. We are prepared to make proof on any notice. I want to state to the Senator from Virginia that I am not objecting to the man because he was a "tramp" printer. I was once a real tramp printer. I walked from Oklahoma City to Norman, 18 long miles, with the thermometer hanging at zero, without a nickel in my pocket, when I was a "tramp" printer.

Mr. GLASS. Then why does the Senator keep on deriding tramp printers?

Mr. LONG. God knows I never used the term or referred to them in any but a proper way. I have stood by the men who helped me in those days, but here this rascal has turned on them and used the knowledge he gained to destroy them after he was in a position to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope that Senators here present will not conclude from what the Senator from Louisiana has just stated, or from anything he has said about Mr. Moore in this connection, that there is not another side to this question. I should like to have Senators hear the other side. I do not desire to present that side to the Senators if they want to send the nomination back to the committee. But whether it is sent back or whether it is not sent back, I ask Senators to be fair-minded enough not to conclude from what the Senator from Louisiana has said that this man is anything like as black as he has been painted by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to make a motion, in view of the uncertainty that is in many minds, that the nomination be sent back to the Finance Committee for further hearings. I now make that motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the motion is debatable, of course.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes; it is debatable.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky. If he is prepared here on the floor of the Senate to controvert the charges made by the Senator from Louisiana, then I think the Senate ought to hear him.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not prepared to controvert the statement that this man Moore is an associate of Mr. Sullivan or that Mr. Sullivan is a divekeeper. I know nothing about it. There never was any intimation until today that any such charge would be brought forward. Of course I cannot answer a charge I never heard of before about a man I never saw but once and did not know him then. I was not informed by the Senator from Louisiana who he was.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If there ever was a committee that showed consideration and patience in the matter of a nomination, it was the Finance Committee with reference to this question. We tried to be agreeable. We tried to suit the convenience of the Senator and to comply with his wishes with reference to the hearing. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has already stated how the Senator from Louisiana came in at the eleventh hour. There was nothing in the evidence that showed any connection between Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Moore with reference to race tracks and all that kind of business, of which I know nothing.

Here are some of the questions which the Senator from Louisiana asked of Mr. Moore when the Senator came in at the eleventh hour:

Senator LONG. You were appointed there through Colonel Sullivan, weren't you?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Senator LONG. You were not?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; had nothing to do with it.

Senator LONG. Were you ever affiliated with Colonel Sullivan in any of his race tracks down there?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Senator LONG. You never were?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Senator LONG. You were not on any of his boards?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Senator LONG. You were not connected with any of the clubs he ran there in connection with his race tracks?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

Senator LONG. When your appointment was made, it was given out in statements that you were appointed as an anti-Long man there, wasn't it?

Mr. MOORE. Here?

Senator LONG. No; in New Orleans.

Mr. MOORE. You mean to this office?

Senator LONG. I mean, it was heralded out to the public press, with your knowledge, consent, and sanction, that you were appointed as an anti-Long man?

Mr. MOORE. I am not responsible for what the press says, Senators, because I had no connection whatever with the press.

Senator LONG. You knew that, though? It was given out in the statements that you were appointed there, on the ground that you were persona non grata to HUEY P. LONG?

Mr. MOORE. That was not the reason. It was because I was persona grata to the administration.

Senator LONG. You say it was not given out, and you did not help give that out?

Mr. MOORE. I did not give that out.

Senator LONG. Of course, you know that you are a personal enemy of mine, and have been for many years?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; I do not know that.

Senator LONG. You know that we do not even speak—that is true, isn't it?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; no, sir. The last time I met you I spoke to you. I was in Baton Rouge, when the legislature was in session. I stopped you and introduced my son to you, and you spoke to me very pleasantly.

Senator LONG. How long ago has that been?

Mr. MOORE. That is about a year and a half ago.

Senator LONG. Why go back a year and a half ago? Why not refer to the time you were in the Roosevelt dining room, when Mr. Charles Hamilton was there, when Mr. Hamilton spoke, and you did not speak to me and I did not speak to you?

Mr. MOORE. No; I spoke to you, Senator.

Senator LONG. You did?

Mr. MOORE. On all occasions. The last time the Senator addressed me, he slapped me on the back and called me "Dan", and said, "Hello."

Senator LONG. That is false.

Mr. MOORE. I did not stand up and shake hands with him, as the gentleman next to me did, but I spoke to him.

Senator LONG. I deny that. That is absolutely false.

Mr. MOORE. I can prove that.

Senator LONG. That is positively untrue.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Moore was asked questions about it, as what I have just read discloses. We went into it as fully as we could. I submit to Senators that they ought not to make up their minds without hearing the other side. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] was a member of the subcommittee which heard this matter. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] were members of the subcommittee. I sat in with the subcommittee.

Why refer the nomination back to the committee? Let us settle it here. If the Senate does not want to confirm him, all right, but let us hear the matter through. Let us not make up our minds simply because a Senator is argumentative and in his speech here for the first time brings out these charges. Let us have the other side. Senators do not know that the Typographical Union of Fort Worth, where Mr. Moore worked on the Fort Worth Star for 2½ years, endorsed him.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has read a little statement. There was no discourtesy shown the committee. On the other hand, the Senator from Mississippi knows a good deal more about this, I am afraid, than he is saying on the floor. I do not believe the Senator from Mississippi doubts for a moment that I will prove everything by sworn testimony that I have said on the floor here today.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator had every opportunity to prove it before the committee.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator from Mississippi know John P. Sullivan?

Mr. HARRISON. I know him.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator know that he is a gambler down there and always has been?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not.

Mr. LONG. Then the Senator from Mississippi is the most ignorant man that ever lived 20 miles from New Orleans. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I may be very ignorant, but I do not know all the gamblers around New Orleans.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator read the newspapers?

Mr. HARRISON. I know the charges the Senator has made.

Mr. LONG. They are in the newspapers. Let the Senator look at the newspapers. I have read from both of the newspapers here, and they both say he is a low-diver. It has never been questioned down there.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator—

Mr. LONG. Let me tell the Senator about this matter.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Sullivan is not on trial here, is he?

Mr. LONG. I have shown here that Sullivan has transplanted his office into the Office of the Collector of Internal Revenue, and the office force work part of the day in his office and part of the day in the Office of the Collector of Internal Revenue. No; the Senator does not want sworn testimony. He knows it will come out if I ever get this matter back to the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator had every opportunity before the committee.

Mr. LONG. Talk about not being able to prove anything! The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] said he does not know that Bradley is a gambler. Whenever the committee goes into this thing in the right way, I will prove that he is Sullivan's partner and runs the Casino and dives from one end of the country to the other, and that he is running this office with it all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator prove it by his own personal knowledge?

Mr. LONG. I will prove it with evidence that is just as good as it can be. I have not been in there myself. However, I will go down there and go into it, if the Senator wants me to do so. Send me down there, and I will go there tonight. Let the Senate tell me to do it, and I will go down there and place a bet tonight; and I will lose the bet, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. The trouble with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is that the Senator from Mississippi did not stay in here and hear the charges. Those of us who stayed here and heard all the charges and the statements read by the Senator from Louisiana may have been entirely differently impressed than was the Senator from Mississippi.

The Senator from Mississippi comes in here and opposes a motion for recommitment after not having been here and heard all the charges that were made. I think the charges are serious. If it be true that the Senator from Louisiana has been as negligent and as disrespectful as is charged—and I am not here to defend the Senator from Louisiana—that does not excuse this body from getting all the facts charged here this afternoon. The fact that the Senator from Louisiana may have been negligent or discourteous to the subcommittee will not excuse this body for confirming a man in the face of these charges.

Mr. LONG. I was not negligent, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. Well, let us admit that the Senator was; and I think he was.

Mr. LONG. I was not.

Mr. COUZENS. Nevertheless, that does not excuse this body for confirming the nominee under these circumstances.

Mr. LONG. I will ask the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] if I was negligent. He knows where I was. The Chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. ASHURST] knows where I was.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, did the Senator apprise the Senator from Utah that he had for 2 months been negotiating for a date upon which he should make personal protest against the nomination and ask the Senator from Utah to postpone the Judiciary Committee meeting in order that he might appear before the other committee; or did the Senator's presence before the Judiciary Committee indicate that he thought that hearing was more important than the hearing we were holding on a matter in which he was personally interested?

Mr. LONG. That statement is not correct, and the Senator will agree with me that he did not postpone this hearing 2 months for me. He postponed it more than 1 month for Moore.

Mr. BARKLEY. I postponed it 1 month for the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Once for me and once for Moore. I protested against Moore having his month, but the Senator gave Moore the other month. They did postpone it for me 3 or 4 weeks, and I thank the Senator for doing so. It was not an unusual thing; but the Senator from Utah had a matter that he had been trying to get the committee together on for a year, and he finally got them together. I am not responsible for the failure of a quorum to appear. I attended every time the Senator from Utah called his committee together. I showed up every time, but he never could get his quorum. Instead of talking about my being negligent, if everybody attended as many of these committee hearings as I did there would not be many people charged with negligence. I show up, I think, at more of these committee meetings than the majority of Members of the Senate do.

I said to the committee—the Senator from Kentucky has forgotten it—"I am sorry I had to attend the meeting of the Judiciary Committee." Here it is, in my statement to the committee. I said, "I have done the best I could. I addressed you a letter. That is all I could do."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, regardless of whether the Senator from Louisiana was negligent or whether the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky is correct—and I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that probably the Senator from Louisiana was negligent in not being there—it seems to me that is beside the issue. If these charges are true, then the man ought not to be confirmed as collector of internal revenue. If they are not true, and both Senators from the State object to him on the ground that he is obnoxious to them, in my judgment he ought not to be confirmed. But the very least the Senate can do in the face of these charges, it seems to me, is to hear the evidence and ascertain whether or not the charges can be substantiated by evidence.

Mr. LONG. I am willing to have the nomination recommitted.

Mr. COUZENS. Let us have the question put on recommitment.

Mr. HARRISON. No, Mr. President; before we do that the other side should be heard. I will ask the Senator from Michigan if he is not willing to have that done.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, I have no objection to the Senator from Mississippi being heard; but he was out of the Chamber when all this testimony was submitted, and now he walks in here and opposes the recommitment without hearing the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am sorry that the Senator's eyes have become dim.

Mr. LONG. I want the Senator from Mississippi to defend John P. Sullivan—

Mr. HARRISON. Just a moment. I have the floor. The Senator took the floor away—

Mr. LONG. I want to answer the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. Just a moment, and I will give the floor to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I want the Senator from Mississippi to defend John P. Sullivan here if he can.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. CLARK. The point of order is that the Senator from Louisiana yielded the floor to the Senator from Michigan for the purpose of making a motion, which the Senator from Michigan made. That motion is debatable. The Senator from Mississippi claimed the floor in his own right, and now has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LONG. That is not a correct statement of the facts, Mr. President. I yielded for an interruption in my remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. I want the chairman of the subcommittee, who made the unanimous report on this nomination, to tell the committee and the Senate what happened.

Mr. LONG. Go ahead and take the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator before I finish, however, that I have made no attempt to defend Mr. John P. Sullivan. I know nothing about Mr. John P. Sullivan. I heard it stated here that he and the Senator from Louisiana were the "gold-dust twins" in the campaign for Governor down in Louisiana, but that now they have been weaned apart. I do not know anything at all about Mr. Sullivan, but I do think the Senate ought to know what the facts are with reference to this nomination.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. HARRISON. Nothing has appeared in the hearing that connects Mr. Moore and Mr. John P. Sullivan. It is quite true that Mr. Sullivan today, because he supported the Democratic ticket down there, and he was opposed to the Long ticket, I think stands in some favor with the administration. I do not suppose there is any doubt about that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. He did not support either Roosevelt or the Democratic administration.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I do not know.

Mr. LONG. That shows just how little the Senator from Mississippi knows about it.

Mr. HARRISON. I accept what the Senator says about the matter. I do not know. I imagined that he was a Democrat, because I did not know there were many Republicans in Louisiana. At least I have been led to believe that he was a Democrat. I do not know; but we ought to have all the facts before this matter goes back to the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] explained at all of the hearings the negligence of the Senator from Louisiana. That is all in the record. I think the Senator from Kentucky will agree that he has said everything that is to be said on the subject, and I think the Senate will agree that the Senator from Louisiana was discourteous, or, at least negligent, in not appearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LONG. Please do not convict me of that yet.

Mr. COUZENS. I still insist, however, that that is not the issue. The issue is that the Senator from Louisiana, one of our colleagues, whether you like him or not, has made serious charges about the connection of this nominee with an alleged gambler and an alleged crook. It is alleged that he stacked his office; and the Senate is asked to confirm a man in the face of those charges, when the charges never have been investigated.

I submit that this nomination ought to go back to the committee for a proper hearing of the charges.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to make any statement that I do not think ought to be made at this time in justice to Mr. Moore.

Very wild and very extravagant charges have been made here today by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long], who, after 2 months of delay, did not make them before the subcommittee appointed to consider this nomination. I think the real Mr. Moore ought to be stood up here for just a moment, in order that the Senate may not be prejudiced against him because of what the Senator from Louisiana has said; and after I have made a brief statement about Mr. Moore the Senate can do as it pleases with reference to the motion to send this nomination back to the Finance Committee. I am not concerned one way or the other, as to whether the Senate sends the nomination back or does not send it back, because I have no personal interest in the nomination; and it is not a very pleasant duty for a Member of this body to have to stand up here and oppose the effort of another Member of this body to defeat a nomination for an office when he, either in good faith or without good faith, makes the statement that it is personally obnoxious and objectionable to him.

Mr. Moore was appointed collector of internal revenue for the district of Louisiana some 6 or 8 months ago, while Congress was in recess. I do not know what efforts the Senator from Louisiana made to induce the President to appoint somebody else. I have no information whatever about that. I have not conferred with the President about the matter, and I have not been given any information with respect to that phase of it; but I am informed that Mr. Moore was appointed as collector of internal revenue after the Treasury had made a minute investigation of his character and his qualifications in Louisiana and in the city of New Orleans.

I am informed that while Mr. Moore's appointment was under consideration by the President it became known, of course, as it always becomes known that some outstanding man is under consideration for an appointment so important as that of collector of internal revenue. The newspapers have a way of finding out who is under consideration, and when it became generally known that Mr. Moore was under consideration for appointment to this position in Louisiana, an effort was made to build up a bad reputation or bad political connections on the part of Mr. Moore. Every item of his experience for 25 or 30 years was gone into and, with a fine-toothed comb, dragged out before the public.

What are the facts about this man Moore?

Years and years ago he went to New Orleans as a printer and obtained employment on the New Orleans Times-Picayune. By reason of his efficiency and his character he was promoted from time to time until he became managing editor of the New Orleans Times-Picayune. Most of that time, during these promotions, he has been a member of the typographical union. He had been at one time an officer of the Typographical Union. I believe he had been president of the Louisiana State Typographical Union.

When Mr. Moore became city editor or managing editor of this paper all three of the newspapers in Louisiana became involved in a controversy over whether the foreman should be a member of the union or should not be. They had negotiations. Mr. Moore, according to all the testimony, was a hired man of the board of directors and operated under the direct control of the board of directors; but as a former member of the Typographical Union and as a friend of the Typographical Union he tried in every way he could, representing the ownership of the paper as managing editor, to compose the differences between these papers and the labor organizations. He was unable to do it. The members of the organizations went out on strike, and then these three newspapers took the matter entirely out of Mr. Moore's hands and appointed a referee, who was to carry on the negotiations between the three newspapers and the labor organizations.

The three newspapers entered into an agreement that none of them would accept any compromise that did not suit all of them, and that the referee who had been selected by them should have no authority to compromise the differences except in the presence of the representatives of all three of the New Orleans newspapers. The strike went on. It was never settled, and from that day until this the newspapers of New Orleans have been what are called "open-shop" newspapers.

Subsequently, Mr. Moore left the New Orleans Times-Picayune and went to Texas, and for nearly 3 years he was the managing editor of the Fort Worth Star. When he went to Texas he carried with him some of the very men who had worked under him in New Orleans, and who had been on strike, some of these union printers.

All of the employees in the composing rooms and in the pressrooms of the Fort Worth Star, working under Mr. Moore, were members of the Typographical Union, and when he severed his connection with that paper, and was about to leave, late one afternoon the head of the union in the composition room came in and told him they wanted to have him out in the chapel for a few minutes, and, without knowing what they wanted, he went out there, where, in the presence of every union printer on the Fort Worth Star, they passed resolutions of commendation and appreciation for the services of Mr. Moore while he was in charge of the Fort Worth paper. Since this controversy has arisen, that Typographical Union has passed a resolution endorsing him, and commending his service and his association with the union in Fort Worth.

Mr. Moore came back to New Orleans in 1925, and since that time he has had no connection with any newspaper of any sort. After he came back, because of his former association with the Typographical Union of New Orleans and because of his former association with the New Orleans Times-Picayune, he tried again to compose the difference between the newspapers and the Typographical Union and get the union printers back into all three of these papers in the city of New Orleans. He was unsuccessful in that effort, which he made voluntarily, because he was under no obligation to either side, for he had no connection any longer with either the newspapers or the Typographical Union.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is that the testimony of Mr. Moore?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is the testimony of Mr. Moore, and it is uncontroverted. It is also stated in a letter—

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator let me call attention to the fact that he is relying an awful lot on the contradicted testimony of a man on whom the Supreme Court of Louisiana commented for 103 pages?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; for 103 pages. I wish to say, in reference to that voluminous lawsuit to which the Senator has referred, that I am not familiar with all the facts. This thing happened nearly 20 years ago, and what little I have learned about it is from hastily glancing through the decision, which it would take one a very long time to read.

It seems that a man named Dr. Pierson was the head of an asylum for the insane somewhere in Louisiana; I believe it was called the Jackson Insane Asylum. The New Orleans Times-Picayune, through one of its reporters, began the publication of articles undertaking to show mistreatment of the inmates of that asylum, and they made public a series of articles criticizing the management of that insane asylum by Dr. Pierson.

Dr. Pierson did have the New Orleans Picayune indicted for criminal libel, but the court held it had no jurisdiction. Then later he tried to get an indictment in the city of New Orleans, and was unable to do so. He then brought a civil libel suit, not against Mr. Moore but against the newspaper, and the style of the case is Pierson against the Times-Picayune, the defendant a newspaper, as everybody knows, in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am glad the Senator states that he does not remember the facts very well. It was not a reporter who started the investigation. The decision says that Mr. D. D. Moore, naming him, formed the conspiracy. That is stated in the decision.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what the facts are.

Mr. LONG. Not only that, if the Senator will pardon me a step further, but they did everything they could to reach Moore. They indicted him, but he slipped out of the indictment on the question of jurisdiction. He was too strong an influence with the ring politicians in New Orleans for them to get him indicted, but he was condemned in every term a court could apply to a man. They said that his defense was perjury, and everything else that could be said about the whole outfit was stated in this decision.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether Mr. Moore, as managing editor, was trying to "get" Mr. Pierson or trying to crush him, and I do not know the facts about the management of the insane asylum; but we all know that newspapers very frequently perform a public service by sending their reporters to institutions as to which there are complaints, where there is mismanagement, and where there is mistreatment, and it may be that this reporter, whose name is given in the lawsuit as Mr. Leppert, may have overdrawn the picture.

I believe that as a result of that publication this man Pierson brought a suit against the Times-Picayune, and finally obtained a judgment of some $2,500 for libel. But, be that as it may, that was 20 years ago, and the Senator from Louisiana did not even present the matter to the subcommittee that had this nomination under consideration.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. I handed the decision to the Senate Finance Committee, told them what those holdings were, and I was astounded when the Senator from Kentucky had this nomination confirmed before those Senators could read the decision.

Mr. BARKLEY. I could not vote the nomination out. It was voted out unanimously, by all the members of the Finance Committee, Democrats and Republicans, and the Senator did not bring this matter to the attention of the subcommittee. He brought it in after the subcommittee had made its report and the full committee was about to vote. He came in again at the eleventh hour and called attention to this 103-page decision in a case involving criminal libel against a newspaper in New Orleans, and relied upon that to defeat the report of the subcommittee.

Mr. LONG. I had forgotten that this decision was in the books. I had personal knowledge of the suit. I had no idea that this decision, not having read it particularly, had all these things in it until I was wired from Louisiana and told about it. Then I hurriedly glanced through it, and I saw what it contained.

Mr. BARKLEY. So much for that lawsuit, and so much for the objection against Mr. Moore on account of his connection with the union.

The only man, really, who came before the subcommittee to testify with reference to this matter was a man by the name of Smith. I do not know Mr. Smith. I take it for granted that he is a good citizen of the city of New Orleans, or of the State of Louisiana; I do not know whether he lives in New Orleans or Shreveport or somewhere else. Three or four weeks ago, when the mayor of New Orleans was in Washington, and the newspapers were talking about how badly one or the other, the senior Senator from Louisiana or the mayor, was going to get licked as soon as they could reach each other, the newspapers described this Mr. Smith as the bodyguard of the Senator from Louisiana. He afterward denied that in a letter sent here and read, and I take it for granted that his denial was correct.

Mr. Smith came before the committee, and in the testimony there he said that 20 years ago, in 1914, Mr. Moore had put over on the printers of New Orleans a "yellow dog" contract. We all understand what a "yellow dog" contract is. There was not a scintilla of evidence before the subcommittee and there is not even now before the Senate any evidence that all during the time of Mr. Moore's connection with the New Orleans Times-Picayune there was ever such a thing as a "yellow dog" contract under consideration. That was not the controversy out of which the strike grew in New Orleans. The controversy was as to whether the foremen themselves should be members of the union or whether the newspapers might be allowed to employ foremen who were not members of any union.

Mr. Moore said he opposed vigorously any "yellow dog" contracts there or anywhere else. Then the effort was made to show that he carried a "yellow dog" contract to Texas with him and tried to put it over on the printers in Fort Worth. That is denied not only by Mr. Moore, but the resolution of commendation and of appreciation unanimously adopted in a letter given to him to carry away with him when he left Fort Worth in 1925, contradicts, I think beyond any discussion, the charge that Mr. Moore ever had anything to do with a "yellow dog" contract.

Mr. Moore testified before the subcommittee that he not only made every effort possible to compose the differences between the papers and the printers during the strike, but after it was over, when he had no connection with either, he said, "I am the friend of union labor, and I believe in it."

Mr. President, who is this man Moore? He has been back in New Orleans for something like 10 years. During a part of that time he has been in charge of the public library in the city of New Orleans, the public library, where women and children go for reading, where students out of school go in order to get books which they may take home and study in an atmosphere of refinement and education and enlightenment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Sullivan put him in there, and I had him kicked out of there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I think, if that is true, that ought to be chalked up to Sullivan's credit.

Mr. LONG. I am the man who had him fired out. Sullivan put him in there.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator has been against him all the time.

Mr. LONG. I knew Sullivan's crowd was not fit to be with women and children, and I had him kicked out of there.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator was a mighty man in New Orleans!

Mr. LONG. Yes; when I had the power, that kind of a man did not "go" there.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator had him put out, it was because of the power the Senator exercised as the Governor of Louisiana and not necessarily because Mr. Moore was not qualified to do the work of a librarian in the library of the city of New Orleans.

Mr. LONG. No; the way I had him put out was that when I was asked, as Governor, to help raise funds for that city,

I told them that until they kicked Sullivan and his crowd out I could not afford to have my administration identified with it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was that before or after Mr. Sullivan gave a big banquet in New Orleans at which the Senator was the honor guest?

Mr. LONG. He never did that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been informed to that effect.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has been informed about a good many things.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not a fact that 2 or 3 weeks after the Senator's nomination for Governor, in the spring of 1928, Mr. John P. Sullivan and Col. Robert Ewing got up a large banquet in New Orleans at which the Senator was the guest of honor?

Mr. LONG. That is not true; it was gotten up by Mr. James P. Butler and Mr. William P. Dillon and Col. Robert Ewing, and Sullivan was not even at the banquet, so far as I remember. But had he been, it would have been all right.

Mr. CLARK. I am not prepared to say whether or not Mr. Sullivan was at the banquet, but I happened to be in New Orleans at the time, and I happen to know that he was assisting in getting up the banquet.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri happens to know nothing about it, because his side was at that time fighting me. He was not at that banquet. His was the only crowd that did not get in on it.

Mr. CLARK. That, Mr. President, is perfectly true. There is no question about that.

Mr. LONG. Everyone else in Louisiana was in on that banquet, except that party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana said that he had Mr. Moore kicked out of the library. I believe he is still the head of the crippled children's organization in New Orleans. Is that true?

Mr. LONG. I do not think that is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I think it is.

Mr. LONG. I do not think so. How did he get that position?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know how he got it, but I suppose the politics of the State of Louisiana is not so corrupt and so crooked that an honest man cannot get a job now and then. I do not know who selected Mr. Moore as the head of the crippled children's organization of the city of New Orleans, but I do know that the testimony before the committee shows that for years he has been connected with that organization; that he has given of his time and of his money, without compensation, for the benefit of the crippled children in New Orleans. I do not think he ought to be impaled in the Senate because of the Senator's personal opposition, and a move made to brand him as a crook and as an associate of denizens of haunts of vice and of crooks simply because the Senator from New Orleans does not desire to have his nomination confirmed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not desire further to take the time of the Senate. I merely desired to present the side of Mr. Moore to the Members of this body. I know nothing about Colonel Bradley, except that he is a distinguished Kentuckian, with a large bluegrass farm, engaged in breeding race horses, and I never heard his integrity or his character questioned until the Senator did so today.

I do not know anything about the Casino in Florida, because that is the only State of the Union I have never been in. I do not know whether the Casino is a dive, or a place where men bet on horse races, or whether it is a place where they have pari-mutuel machines, or what it is. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana, however, that if he had done as much for unfortunate men in Louisiana, for unfortunate children and crippled children in that State, as Col. E. R. Bradley has done for them in Kentucky, he would have more to his credit than he has at this time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that I have done more for the poor people in Louisiana than 40 Bradleys, and I have never caused the suicides that Bradley has caused. I have heard of many men who blew out their brains after coming out of Bradley's dive.

Mr. BARKLEY. Probably not all those who ought to, have blown out their brains in Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I have bought coffins for those who blew out their brains after coming out of Bradley's dive.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know Mr. Sullivan, either. I do not know whether he is a partner of Mr. Moore or not; but I know that on the day when the Senator from Louisiana blew into the committee meeting when we were about to adjourn the meeting of the subcommittee, he saw Mr. Sullivan, if it was Sullivan. He saw Mr. Moore, who was testifying in his own behalf. He saw a third man sitting by the side of Mr. Moore; and the Senator from Louisiana marched down in front and proceeded to cross-examine Mr. Moore as to whether he had not been his enemy.

He never said to the subcommittee, "He has been backed by Sullivan." He never said to the subcommittee, "Here is a gambler and a dive-keeper who has brought this man in here and is now backing him." All that he did was to ask Mr. Moore a question or two as to whether he had not refused to speak to him; and Mr. Moore, in reply to that, said that it was not true. He also said that when the Senator from Louisiana was a candidate for Governor in Louisiana, he voted for him, but that he voted for Senator Ransdell against him when he was a candidate for the Senate. He also said in that testimony that he voted for the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] when he ran against the then Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Broussard, 2 years ago.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] enjoys the respect of us all. I desire to say that no new Senator who has come into this body has made a more favorable and a more profound impression upon the Senate for his dignity, for his poise, for his intellect, and for his character than has the junior Senator from Louisiana. I am glad to pay him that tribute, because I think he is entitled to it. I recall that after the hearing had been set before the subcommittee, I went to the junior Senator from Louisiana and asked him if he desired to be heard upon the nomination of Mr. Moore, and in the fair and dignified way which characterizes all his communications he said, "I am taking no hand in this controversy." I made that statement in the subcommittee, and it is in the record. I call on the Senator to say whether I am correct about that.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I certainly would be less than human if I did not appreciate the very kind and complimentary references that have been made to me by the Senator from Kentucky. I am very much pleased indeed to know that I enjoy his esteem, and that my course of conduct has met with his approval while I have been in the Senate, and I hope it will continue to meet with the approval of himself and other Senators.

Of course we may differ from time to time in our views of public matters. We may enter into heated debates with one another, but I hope I shall always conduct myself toward the Senator from Kentucky and toward the other Senators in this Chamber so as to command their respect and their esteem.

It is true, as the Senator from Kentucky has stated, that when he brought this matter to my attention, I told him that I was making no fight against Mr. Moore, or in substance made that statement, and that I was taking no hand in it.

Mr. President, let me make the additional statement that I understood that whenever a Senator from a State made an objection to the appointment of someone who was to discharge the duties of an office that was wholly intrastate, and based that objection upon the ground that the person named was personally obnoxious to him, the Senate respected that objection. Certainly, so far as I was concerned, as the junior Senator from Louisiana, out of courtesy to the senior Senator from Louisiana, if for no other reason, I expected to respect his objection. Therefore I had an additional reason for not taking any part whatsoever in the controversy that arose in respect to this appointment.

I may go further and state that so far as Mr. Moore is concerned he is not personally obnoxious to me. I have had very little intercourse and association with Mr. Moore. As I stated a while ago when I was on the floor, I recall having some extended conversation with him some 10 or 15 years ago, and have occasionally met him from time to time since then. We are neither particularly friendly nor are we enemies. He has made the statement that he voted for me when I was a candidate. I have no reason to doubt it. I do not know what his attitude was. I do not know whether he was for me or against me during the campaign, but I do not question his statement as to what he did.

If the Senator from Kentucky will bear with me for just a moment, while I am on my feet—

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. This is a matter that rather vitally concerns the people of the State of Louisiana. It is a very controversial matter in that State. It appears to be a very controversial matter upon the floor of the Senate.

The senior Senator from Louisiana has made some very grave and serious charges in connection with this appointment, not only as affecting Mr. Moore, but as affecting others who, he states, were associated with him in undertaking to obtain his appointment to this office. With equal fervor, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] defends Mr. Moore. I think—and I should like my wishes known, as a Senator from Louisiana—that on the whole it would be best to refer the question back to the Committee on Finance, in order that the committee may go into this matter. I think it is a duty they owe not only to the State of Louisiana but more especially to the Senate itself.

It may be that the senior Senator from Louisiana will not be able to support his charge, either in whole or in part. It may be that he will. Certainly, however, the public interest is not going to suffer by reason of having a fair and an impartial and a thorough investigation of charges made upon the floor of this Chamber by one of our colleagues against an appointee to an office so important as that of collector of internal revenue in the State of Louisiana.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Kentucky will come to the conclusion I have reached. My position in the matter is not one of partisanship or bias one way or the other, nor do I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky is biased or prejudiced. I am sure he has no personal interest at all in the matter. He has simply in his usual clear, strong, and vehement manner given expression to his views upon the subject as they came to him as a member of the subcommittee that had this question under investigation. I hope, however, that the Senators will come to the conclusion that in the end it will be best to refer the whole matter back to the Committee on Finance, and let that committee make an investigation, and report back at this session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his statement. I respect his sincerity.

I desire to state one thing further. I realize that from time immemorial, where a Senator objects to a nomination or appointment of a citizen of his State to a local office, and states that the appointment is personally objectionable and obnoxious to him, the Senate heretofore, almost as a universal rule—which does not have the force of law, but is the result of courtesy—has respected that objection, and has refused to confirm the nominee. In recent years, I think it ought to be said, there has been some modification of that unwritten rule to the extent of asking or expecting the Senator who makes the objection on personal grounds to present some reason for the objection. Otherwise its arbitrary exercise would make it impossible for an Executive ever to appoint anybody in the State who could be confirmed.

The subcommittee discussed that matter, I will say, very frankly and very sincerely before it made its report to the full committee. It was discussed in the full committee before the nomination was reported. It was felt by the subcommittee and by the members of the Finance Committee as a whole, without regard to party, that there were peculiar circumstances connected with the Louisiana situation which justified us in reporting out the nomination and having it brought out on its merits on the floor of the Senate. We have done that.

I have said all I want to say about it. I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long] a question before I submit a request which I have in mind. If this nomination is returned to the Finance Committee, will the Senator from Louisiana go before that committee, either before the full committee or a subcommittee? Will he go before it himself? Will he bring such witnesses as he may be able to bring before the committee to substantiate the charges he has made here on the floor of the Senate this afternoon if we send the nomination back to the committee?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Kentucky submits his request may I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question? I hope the Senator from Kentucky will make the suggestion that the nomination be recommitted to the committee. It is the intention of the Chairman of the Finance Committee to call the committee together on Thursday morning of next week in order that a hearing may be held. In other words, the matter is not going to be put off and postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LONG. The Senator said Thursday next?

Mr. HARRISON. Thursday morning.

Mr. LONG. That is a very short time. I have made some sweeping charges about this man and about his gang. I want to have the opportunity to substantiate those charges from Dan to Beersheba. Give me 10 days and I will run him out of here on them.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; we will give the Senator 10 days. The committee will proceed at the end of 10 days to take some action.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee I ask unanimous consent that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Finance under the circumstances, and with the understanding we have just reached relative to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters which were ordered to be placed on the calendar.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President I move that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H.R. 257. An act to authorize full settlement for professional services rendered to an officer of the United States Army;

H.R. 8573. An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes; and

H.J.Res. 207. Joint resolution requiring agricultural or other products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other instrumentality of the Government finances the exporting of such products.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 6604) to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties; to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels; and for other purposes, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., DEPARTMENTS' APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes. It is a unanimous report of the committee, and I think will occasion no debate of any kind.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore laid before the Senate the conference report on House bill 7513, which had been submitted previously today by Mr. McKELLAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the conference report?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the conference report on the bill making appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Justice, Commerce, and State. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the conference report is agreed to, I wish to make a statement with reference to an amendment which I offered and which was adopted restricting the use of the prison capital operating fund for Federal prisons.

The committee has agreed to the elimination of that amendment, after a conference between Mr. Sanford Bates, the superintendent of prisons, and myself. The superintendent of prisons has submitted to me a letter in which he states that voluntary limitation will be placed during the next fiscal year upon white duck and other textiles made in the Federal prison at Atlanta, which will accomplish the same purposes the amendment would have accomplished.

I desired to have this statement appear in the Record.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was upon that statement that the committee acted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, March 24, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal God, Thou who didst call the universe into being, ordered its forces, and started its creations, bear with our infirmities. As Thou art the source of all wisdom, the inspiration of all good thoughts and noble endeavor, nurture in us willing minds and understanding hearts. We praise Thee that it is Thy goodness that calls us to rejoice rather than to complain, to accept humbly and to use righteously Thy unspeakable blessings; lift us, gracious Lord, to that high level from which our hearts shall move irresistibly toward righteousness. O God, grant that we may never be caught in the uncontrolled eddies of unrighteousness. Almighty God, expand and enrich our national ideals, direct our country in the solution of its unsolved problems, and dispel all earth-born clouds wherever they cast a shadow. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8573. An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

EXPORTATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk House Joint Resolution 207, requiring agricultural or other products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other instrumentality of the Government finances the exporting of such products, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

May I say that this has been considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

The Clerk read the title of the bill with the following Senate amendments:

Line 4, after "Corporation", insert "or any other instrumentality of the Government."

Line 5, after "agricultural", insert "or other."

Line 8, strike out "United States Shipping Board" and insert "Shipping Board Bureau."

Line 9, after "Corporation", insert "or other instrumentality of the Government."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution requiring agricultural or other products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other instrumentality of the Government finances the exporting of such products."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand from the gentleman's statement, these amendments are entirely agreeable to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] and the other members of the minority on the committee?

Mr. BLAND. At a meeting that was held, at which a quorum was present, Mr. LEHLBACH, Mr. GIFFORD, and Mr. EDMONDS were there, and possibly some other members, but I remember distinctly these three gentlemen were present and voted to concur in the amendments.

Mr. SNELL. It is a unanimous report?

Mr. BLAND. It is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

SETTLEMENT FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Chairman of the Committee on Claims, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 257) to authorize full settlement for professional services rendered to an officer of the United States Army, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, with the following Senate amendments:

Line 3, strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

Lines 5 and 6, strike out "the appropriation 'Medical and Hospital Department, 1929'", and insert "any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain what this bill is and where it came from?

Mr. BOYLAN. This is a bill that we passed for the relief of a major in the Regular Army who was suffering from a rare disease which incapacitated him from active service. After being treated in all the Army hospitals, including the Walter Reed Hospital, with the permission of the War Department he underwent an operation at the hands of a private surgeon which cost $1,000. The result of this operation was to restore his usual health, and he is now in active service performing his duties.

Mr. SNELL. This is a claims bill that has been considered by the Senate?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes; and it has come back with a Senate amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this involves the payment of $1,000 to an outside surgeon for this private operation?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it involve anything else?

Mr. BOYLAN. No. That is all.

Mr. BLANTON. What did the Senate do with the bill? Did they enlarge upon the matter?

Mr. BOYLAN. No. The bill provided that this was to be paid out of the hospital allowance for the year 1929.

Mr. BLANTON. It is immaterial which fund this comes out of, because, after all, it comes out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BOYLAN. Exactly, but the Senate saw fit to amend the bill in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not affect the rights of any other person except the one officer?

Mr. BOYLAN. Absolutely no one else.

Mr. SNELL. There is no precedent established by this bill?

Mr. BOYLAN. No, indeed; in fact, I may say that the bill was approved by the War Department, which is very unusual.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the completion of the business on the Speaker's desk tomorrow morning I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOSS. Are we going to be in session tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the House should know what the gentleman is going to talk about.

Mr. MAY. I expect to talk about one of two things. I shall talk about cotton and tobacco or I shall present to the House a few remarks on the subject of a bill which I introduced at the last session of the Congress providing for subsistence homesteads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not often make a point of no quorum, but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] desires to make a statement about a controversial matter in which all Members are interested. I think the gentleman is entitled to have a quorum present to hear him, and I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-one Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Accounts is one of the oldest committees of the House. It has supervision and control over the contingent fund and all House expenditures. Its work is always arduous and at times most disagreeable and unpleasant. It is the "no" committee of the House.

For 10 years I have been a member of this committee. During no part of this time have I ever seen the slightest partisanship exhibited in the committee. We are practically always unanimous on every question, and I here and now wish to pay full tribute to the members of the committee for their splendid support.

In the natural course of things, when the Democratic Party came into power, I became chairman of the committee, and the same conditions existing there when I was in the minority to a large extent now exist. We think we have made a record of achievement. We do not come up here on the floor of the House and prate about it, but it is sufficient to say that we have saved the taxpayers of this Nation thousands and thousands of dollars by careful scrutiny and investigation of the matters that come before us.

Among its many duties, the committee has jurisdiction over the House restaurant. On June 2, 1921, 4 years before I entered Congress, Mr. Clifford Ireland, Republican chairman of the Committee, from the State of Illinois, introduced a resolution in the House, which was unanimously passed, placing the House restaurant under the Committee on Accounts. Prior to this time it had been operated as a very unsatisfactory concession. For the last 12 fiscal years this restaurant has been operated at an average net annual deficit of $25,961.72. There are many reasons why there should be a loss. The entire set-up is practically for one meal, and naturally the overhead expenses are large. Since April 15, 1933, and up to this hour, we have operated this restaurant without a loss and with a profit of approximately $50. [Applause.]

In testifying before the Appropriations Committee, I said the following:

To summarize, we have been able to make this record with the House restaurant since April 15, 1933, by putting into effect many economies, by strict supervision over buying and expenditures, by an almost perfect checking system which has been finely reflected in our receipts, by elimination of much waste, and by the fine work of the restaurant staff under its capable manager, Mr. P. H. Johnson.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may insert in my remarks this record of operation for the last 12 fiscal years.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

² House restaurant had on hand $8,807.22 after paying outstanding debts incurred during fiscal year 1933. Taking this figure into consideration, also the $1,000 refunded in July 1932, the actual net expenditure necessary to operate the House restaurant for the fiscal year 1933 would amount to $22,397.53. This would reduce the average per fiscal year to $25,227.79.

Total pay rolls	$293,593.05

Mr. WARREN. I wish again to state, and for the RECORD to show, that up to this hour, since April 15, 1933, the restaurant has been operated without a deficit and not one penny has been drawn from the appropriations made by the Congress for it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Not right now; I will yield later.

When this restaurant was established, in 1921, under the chairmanship of Mr. Clifford Ireland, Republican Representative from Illinois, he opened a place in the basement for the serving of colored employees and visitors. Mind you, this was 4 years before I entered this body. This was continued under Mr. Clarence MacGregor, Republican Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, from New York, and it was continued by Mr. Charles L. Underhill, Republican Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, from Massachusetts, and has been continued by me. In this place we give the same service, the same food as we do upstairs, and the same cleanly surroundings prevail. The prices there are slightly lower.

I have made no rule. I am carrying out the policies and rules that have been in force ever since this restaurant was established, and before I came here.

A speech was made on this floor 2 days ago in which the authority of the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts was challenged, and insinuations were made that some of the information came from members of the committee.

I read to the House the minutes of the organization meeting of the Committee on Accounts for the Seventy-third Congress, held on March 23, 1933:

Mr. WOLFENDEN, Republican from Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution:

"That the chairman be authorized to report out all death resolutions without a meeting of the committee, and that the chairman be empowered to use his own discretion in dealing with Members in regard to telegraph, telephone, and all other matters which properly come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts, including the management of the House restaurant and all rules and regulations pertaining to the same."

That resolution was seconded by Mr. McLEAN, Republican, of New Jersey, and by Mr. ALLEN, Republican, of Illinois, and was unanimously passed by the committee.

The identical resolution was offered by Mr. Underhill, of Massachusetts, at the organization of the Committee on Accounts at its first meeting, December 19, 1931.

I have traced that resolution, ladies and gentlemen of the House, from this date back to 1921, under the chairmanship of Mr. Ireland, and find that it had the identical wording, and in every instance was offered by the ranking minority member of the committee.

There is a petition on the desk to discharge the Rules Committee, and have an investigation. There [pointing to the minute book] is the authority that I have acted under, there is what the petition seeks to find out, and they could have found out that at any time.

Something was said that I initiated this thing, and that it had been going on for some time. The first knowledge of any violation of the rules that ever came to me during my chairmanship of the committee was, I think, about January 20. I would have despised myself had I not met it and accepted the responsibility that had been placed on me by this House and by the committee. [Applause.]

Again, not one single member of the Committee on Accounts, either in private or in meeting, has ever presented this matter to me or challenged anything I have done in regard to it. If I am wrong, I pause to hear anyone challenge that statement.

I believe that I am as free from racial and religious intolerance as any man in this House. In my State the races live together side by side; probably about 30 percent of our population are colored, and we are getting along in peace and harmony. This amicable relationship and understanding is reflected in the notable progress of North Carolina.

My time is going on, and I shall not discuss some of the recent happenings. I shall not dwell on the fact that I have received 50 or more letters from the First Congressional District of Illinois, from colored citizens, telling me the motive behind this thing.

One day last week a lot of Communists came down to see us. Another day they described themselves as Socialists; another day a demonstration was made by those who claimed to be representatives of the International Labor Defense. Finally, on last Saturday, the supreme outrage occurred, when a mob of toughs and hoodlums from Howard University came down and almost precipitated a riot.

That very morning a respectable colored citizen called up the authorities of that university and pleaded that these students be not permitted to come here, but it went unheeded.

Every paper in this town the day before carried full notice, with blazing headlines, that it was going to be done. Filth, vulgarity, and profanity rang out through the corridors down there. The police told me that never in their lives had they ever taken such insults.

Three splendid ladies pushed their way out of the restaurant into that mob, came to my office, and told me that they would never put their foot in there again on account of the vile and horrible language that had been used in their presence.

A feeble effort was made 2 days ago expressing disapproval of those actions. There was one man who could have stopped it. He did not because he did not want to do it. By reasons of these demonstrations our records show that for the last 10 days the restaurant has lost considerable money, while prior to that we were making some money every day.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have calmly and dispassionately given a recital of the facts and the truth in this matter. Personally, it is a matter of utter indifference to me. I am opposed to any change in the present conduct of the restaurant, but otherwise I do not care. I am always ready to meet, and to meet squarely, any issue that ever arises here in this body, but it is entirely up to the Members of the House to settle this whole thing according to both their desires and their tastes. [Applause.]

THE AIR MAIL

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the bill be limited to 22 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and one half by myself, and that debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 8687. Pending that he asks unanimous consent that debate upon the bill be limited to 22 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and that debate be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to say on behalf of the minority members of the committee that the suggestion of the chairman of the committee in respect to the time for debate is entirely agreeable to us.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 8687.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the bill now under consideration, H.R. 8687, is in my judgment one of the most important parts of the President's recovery program, and will materially assist in restoring prosperity and setting the wheels of industry turning again.

The purposes sought to be attained by its enactment are clearly set forth in the first few lines of the bill, as follows:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living; in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression; in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce.

This legislation is an emergency measure to meet a great emergency. The people of this country will vividly recall—in fact, will never forget—the tragic conditions prevailing at the time of President Roosevelt's inauguration on March 4, 1933. At that time the country was on the brink of absolute economic ruin. Millions of our people were out of employment and walking the highways, the streets, and sidewalks of our cities and industrial centers, vainly seeking employment to provide the barest necessities of life to sustain them and their families.

Banks were closing daily in every section of the land. In some States they were all closed by the State authorities, impounding the life savings of many of our people, and tying up the meager bank deposits which were the very lifeblood of agriculture, industry, and commerce.

Starvation and destitution were lurking in every nook and corner of our country. Fear in the minds of the people, coupled with a lack of leadership, increased and accentuated the unparalleled conditions of distress existing throughout the land. Farmers were being forced to dispose of their crops at ruinous prices, far below the cost of production, and millions of farms and homes, both rural and urban, were being lost through foreclosures or lack of ability to pay taxes. Such was the condition and the picture of despair constantly in the thoughts of the American people. The economic conditions existing at that time had no parallel in our country. President Hoover described it in his Cleveland speech in 1930 as an economic pestilence, and in his speech of acceptance in 1932 as a calamity unparalleled in the history of our country.

Under the leadership of President Roosevelt and during this emergency, the Congress has placed in the hands of the President broad discretionary authority, affecting the internal and domestic business affairs of the country.

We are all familiar with the character of powers that have been delegated to the President, who for the past year has been chiefly confining his efforts to the betterment of our domestic problems. Under the exercise of those powers we have seen our banking institutions again placed on a sound and substantial foundation; we have seen the price of agricultural commodities steadily increase, and in some cases doubled; we have seen our industries resume production of those articles and commodities to which our people, and the peoples of the world, have been accustomed; we have witnessed a steadily mounting increase in the purchasing power of the people through increased employment month by month with enlarged weekly pay rolls. We have seen hope and confidence displace gloom and despair.

Now, after 1 year of sincere and successful endeavor to better our domestic affairs, the President is asking that necessary power be placed in his hands so that he may extend his efforts toward bettering our trade with foreign countries, and thereby further promote the general welfare of all the people.

As I shall point out, this bill offers the only practical and feasible method for restoring a normal amount of world trade to the United States. This country has been losing its part in world trade at an alarmingly rapid rate, even more so than the rest of the world. Other countries have provided their executives with authority to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements and machinery to meet the everchanging economic and trade conditions demanding immediate and prompt action.

Let us examine for a moment and see how our country has fared in the markets of the world as compared with other countries. Between 1929 and 1932, world trade declined 60 percent. And that of the United States declined 70 percent. In 1929 the total exports of the United States were $5,241,000,000; they declined in 1932 to $1,611,000,000, or 70 percent; there was a slight increase in 1933 to $1,675,000,000. The exports of the rest of the world in 1929 were $27,794,000,000; in 1932 they were $11,115,000,000, or a decline of 60 percent. We have fallen from 13 percent as our share of world trade to 10 percent.

General imports into the United States fell from $4,339,000,000 in 1929 to $1,323,000,000 in 1932, a decline of 70 percent, and increased slightly in 1933, or a 67-percent drop from 1929. So not only did the volume of our foreign trade decline alarmingly, but in percentage we fell behind the other countries of the world.

This clearly indicates that unless we provide some machinery whereby we can successfully compete with other countries, practically all of whom have delegated similar authority in their executives as this bill now proposes placing in the hands of our President, our foreign trade unquestionably will continue to decline, and finally be reduced to a negligible quantity.

One of the principal causes for the decline in our foreign trade are the retaliatory tariffs, quotas, embargoes, and other import restrictions enacted by foreign countries following the passage of the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act, and in retaliation against this law.

I had hoped partisanship would be adjourned in the consideration of this bill and that the same would be considered in the spirit uppermost in the mind of President McKinley, who always had the welfare of the people at heart, when in his last utterance he said:

The period of exclusiveness is past. Commercial wars are unprofitable; reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

However, it is quite evident that our Republican friends hope they may gain some partisan advantage by opposing this bill, and notwithstanding the lofty purpose expressed by President Roosevelt in his message to Congress, we find them engaged in a stubborn partisan opposition to this legislation.

President Roosevelt in his message stated:

You and I know, too, that it is important that the country possess within its borders a necessary diversity and balance to maintain a rounded national life, that it must sustain activities vital to national defense, and that such interests cannot be sacrificed for passing advantage * * *

I would emphasize that quick results are not to be expected. The successful building up of trade without injury to American producers depends upon a cautious and gradual evolution of plans.

The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be seriously disturbed. The adjustment of our foreign trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests. In a time of difficulty and unemployment such as this, the highest consideration of the position of the different branches of American production is required. * * *

During the hearings we heard daily what one witness termed "the gospel of fear and death" from the lips of those opposing this bill, and this will be their text, their sermon, and their song during the entire consideration of this bill.

The opponents of this measure are endeavoring to cause the people to believe that the passage of this bill, the placing of similar power in the hands of the President as the people of practically every other country have placed in the hands of their executives, will mean the destruction of small or so-called "inefficient industries."

While the lofty utterances of President Roosevelt can in no way be construed as meaning the destruction of small or so-called "inefficient industries" or their injury, what do they have to say of the utterances of Hon. Ogden Mills, a former Member of this House and Secretary of the Treasury during part of the Hoover administration, when he stated during a speech at Topeka, Kans., on the 29th of January last? I am quoting Mr. Mills' speech:

We will have to abandon the present policy of isolation and intense nationalism and to some extent modify recent tariff practices. I have never understood that a sound system of protection, based on the difference of cost of production at home and abroad, means the erection of impassable trade barriers, the destruction of our commerce with the rest of the world, and the sacrifice of the efficient farmer to save the inefficient manufacturer.

No more severe condemnation of the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act and the policy of isolation than that expressed by Mr. Mills in the above quotation has ever, in my opinion, been made by anyone high in either party.

Now, when President Roosevelt proposes a remedy for the expansion of our foreign trade, and to prevent further encroachment on our rapidly vanishing export trade, we find those of the Grundy school of tariff thought placing every impediment in the way of the President. They tell us that the United States is self-contained; that there is no necessity for expanding our foreign trade; that we are going on a "wild goose chase in search of export markets that do not exist." They even doubt the desirability of expanding our foreign trade as set out in the minority report, as follows, ignoring the fact that the existing means have utterly failed and that similar legislation has been declared constitutional:

If the expansion of foreign trade seems desirable, it should be accomplished by existing constitutional means.

It is astounding to me that anyone should doubt the desirability of expanding the meager foreign markets we now enjoy. According to the evidence presented during the hearings, it seemed to be almost unanimously agreed that we should endeavor to expand our foreign markets for our surplus agricultural and industrial products. The lone exception, as I recall, was expressed by Mr. Samuel Crowther, who appeared on behalf, and at the invitation of, the minority members of the committee, apparently in an effort to lend some color to the claim that serious objection exists to the pending bill. Mr. Crowther fulfilled his assignment to the unanimous approval of the Republican members of the committee as they admitted that "he spoke their language."

Mr. Crowther, in replying to a question asked by Mr. Cooper, as to whether "it is at all important for us to try to revive foreign trade", replied: "I think we are wasting our energy; it is dead, beyond the point of revival." And these statements were endorsed by the minority members of the committee.

Contrast such nonsense as that with the views expressed by President Roosevelt in his message to Congress, in which he stated:

Important branches of our agriculture, such as cotton, tobacco, hog products, rice, cereal and fruit raising, and those branches of American industry whose mass-production methods have led the world, will find expanded opportunities and productive activity in foreign markets, and will thereby be spared in part, at least, the heartbreaking readjustment that must be necessary if the shrinkage of American foreign commerce remains permanent.

A resumption of international trade cannot but improve the general situation of other countries and thus increase their purchasing power. Let us well remember that this in turn spells increased opportunity for American sales.

Legislation such as this is an essential step in the program of national economic recovery which the Congress has elaborated during the past year. It is part of an emergency program necessitated by the economic crisis through which we are passing.

I call the attention of the Democratic Members to this statement of the President, that the measure is an essential step in his program of recovery. President Roosevelt and Secretaries Hull, Roper, and Wallace, and Chairman O'Brien, of the Tariff Commission, all of whom testified as to the necessity for this legislation, are not alone in their conception of the importance and necessity of reviving our foreign trade. Let me quote from the testimony of Mr. James A. Emery, speaking for and in behalf of the tariff committee of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States. Mr. Emery, while not in complete accord with some of the provisions of the bill as it was originally introduced, stated:

I think we fairly represent the industrial viewpoint when we say that the President of the United States can perform no finer service to the country than to enter upon the negotiation of treaties that will in any way enlarge and encourage our foreign trade without impairing the first domestic market of the world. * * *

And later in his testimony he stated:

I want the gentleman to understand from the start what I said; and I repeat it now, so that I may not be misunderstood, that there is no opposition on the part of anyone for whom I have authority to speak to the negotiation of trade agreements or of treaties. They hope, if the President undertakes the negotiations of treaties that are to the advantage of the people of the United States, that he will have a free hand in doing it.

Now let us see how the American Chamber of Commerce feels toward the necessity of reviving our foreign trade by the negotiation of trade agreements, as expressed in May of last year, when the chambers of commerce and trade associations throughout the country voted in favor of the initiation of such reciprocal trade agreements, as expressed by the adoption of the following resolution:

The safeguarding and advancement of our foreign trade should be the purposes of a vigorous commercial policy of our Government. Adaptation of our American economic structure to present world conditions calls for most careful scrutiny of existing policies, keeping in mind always the necessity of assuring stability to our internal industrial and agricultural enterprises, through reasonable protection for American industry, our Government should have power to initiate reciprocal tariff arrangements with foreign countries where such bargaining would be clearly in our national interest. Such agreements would complement our existing flexible tariff in establishing for our country a tariff policy fair alike to our home industry and our competitors abroad.

Then during the hearings Mr. James A. Farrell, representing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, stated:

The national chamber's interest in reciprocal trade negotiations has been due in large part to the belief that the United States has been slower than other leading industrial nations to recognize the important place the foreign trade occupies as a stimulus to domestic recovery and as a permanent reinforcement of our national economic structure. The depression since 1929, being one of drastic decline in buying power throughout the world, resulting in a serious curtailment of international trade, has affected the United States more acutely than most countries and created a serious problem of unemployment which has been a little more acute in this country than it has been in other countries.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has called attention to the decline in our export trade. He called attention to the percentage in the decline of export trade as compared with that of other countries. I should like to have the gentleman express an opinion as to how much he thinks our export business has been affected by the increase in the tariff and the high tariff walls that the other countries have put around themselves, and the general attitude of extreme nationalism prevalent throughout the world at the present time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course, it would take quite a time to even express an intelligent opinion upon that.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Statistics show that the foreign trade of the United States decreased in greater percentage than that of other countries. As the gentleman from Michigan suggests, the high tariff walls erected against the United States accounted in a great measure for that decrease in the foreign commerce of the United States, but the foreign trade of these same countries did not decrease in the same degree, in the same percentage, as the foreign trade of the United States.

Mr. DOUGHTON. After the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy tariff bill, that decline began. The decline did not exist up until that time. That should be some evidence to my friend who, I am satisfied from the question that he has asked, is beginning to see the light.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will yield further, the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was passed in 1930, at the beginning of this depression. Since that time we have not boosted our tariff wall as a good many of these other countries have, so that there would be more of a handicap on our exports going into other countries than there would be on the products of other countries coming into this country.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They increased their tariff rates in retaliation to our high tariff rates, of course.

Mr. MAPES. Whether in retaliation or not, they have increased them?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They have, of course.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Foreign countries have increased their tariff barriers, which prevents the passage of our goods into their countries, under executive authority, which they have. They have entered into, since January 1, 1933, 68 foreign trade agreements, and it is because of their ability to execute foreign trade agreements that their tariff barriers are reduced to certain preferred countries, and they have taken our export trade. These foreign countries, because of such trade agreements, have purchased goods, which would have been exported from this country. They buy them from countries with whom they have made foreign trade agreements, to which they sell their products.

Mr. MAPES. I may say I had no desire at this time to raise any controversial question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman's question is very pertinent.

Mr. MAPES. But I have often wondered how much of our export trade has been affected by this increase in the tariffs of other countries. It has been suggested that this bill will not take care of the trade-agreement situation which the gentleman from Kentucky has mentioned, but I do not care to discuss that.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Referring to the importance of our trade and the place it occupies in our system, Mr. Farrell states:

Seven million persons, it is estimated, are dependent for their livelihood on our foreign trade. It is impossible, therefore, to deal effectively with the problem of unemployment without taking into account the vital importance of our overseas commerce as a means indispensable to the success of the National Recovery Act and as an aid to employment.

The policy of bargaining our way to the markets of the world by means of reciprocal trade agreements is one to which Congress should give careful consideration. Other countries have delegated these powers to the executive, and have already, as in the case of Great Britain and her dominions, made considerable progress ahead of the United States in making foreign-trade promotion instrumental to national economic recovery.

Notice that Mr. Farrell states, "It is estimated 7,000,000 persons are dependent for their livelihood on our foreign trade", and yet the opponents of this bill tell us "we are wasting our energy" and that we are going on a "wild-goose chase in search of export markets that do not exist."

The measure now before us is not only for the development of our foreign trade but is equally, if not more essentially, a measure to prevent further loss of such trade.

In other words, almost every other nation in the world has vested in its executive authority whereby he can deal with this problem overnight, deal with it immediately, deal with it as an emergency, deal with it to meet existing conditions; whereas in this country our Executive has no such opportunity and we must depend on slow, long-drawn-out congressional action. While we are doing that, other nations are taking over the trade of the world, and we are falling far behind.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. EVANS. The other nations to which the gentleman has referred are not restricted with constitutional barriers, are they?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; neither are we in this instance. The history of our Government is full of precedents for this and similar legislation, from 1794 down to the present hour. Authority just as great as this has been vested in the President of the United States many times and has been frequently exercised by various Presidents.

Mr. EVANS. At the same time we have a written Constitution.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course.

Mr. EVANS. And they have not.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is true. But we are proceeding within the spirit and letter of the written Constitution as based upon the precedents established by both Democrats and Republicans, and the gentleman is intelligent enough to know that.

Mr. EVANS. I concede that is the view of the gentleman, but I want to remind the gentleman that we have yet in this country a written Constitution and they have not.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman think anybody is ignorant enough of that to be reminded of it?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. In reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS], the gentleman indicated that from time immemorial, as far as we are concerned, we have been doing the very thing that is requested in this legislation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Something similar.

Mr. BRITTEN. Authorizing the President to negotiate foreign treaties without the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course we have.

Mr. BRITTEN. When have we done that?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not have time to go into it. If the gentleman will read the report, it is set out in many places. The gentleman evidently has not read the report. The very acts are cited and the precedents are set forth.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under the McKinley Act of 1890 Executive agreements to the number of 13 were executed. Under the Dingley Act of 1897, 9 Executive agreements were executed, none of which was referred to either the Senate for ratification or to the Congress.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Section 338 of the present tariff law gives the President of the United States authority to raise duties even without the advice of the Tariff Commission, even without the recommendation of the Tariff Commission. I recommend the gentleman read what has taken place before he asks any further questions.

Mr. BRITTEN. I promise I will not ask any further questions until I have read the gentleman's report.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman is always fair.

Are we to continue standing idly by while the whole commercial structure of our country is being undermined as Nero did while Rome burned? Are we to emulate the ostrich, and bury our heads in the sand and refuse to see that practically every country of continental Europe, as well as England and her major dominions, and several of the countries of South America have vested authority in the executive branch of their respective governments to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with other countries for the purpose of removing trade restrictions, so that their foreign trade can prosper? The United States alone, among the major commercial powers of the world, is without this authority in the hands of the Executive branch of our Government.

It is an alarming thing at a time like this, that we are practically the only nation on earth that has not vested the same or similar power in the hands of our Executive.

In my opinion, we have no choice but to grant to the President the authority to join with the other nations of the world in their negotiations, so as to secure for the United States a greater portion of the normal trade, before the other nations have completed dividing it among themselves.

Are we to continue asleep while the other countries are competing for a share of the world trade, and accept the theory that our foreign trade is dead, beyond the point of revival; that the livelihood of 7,000,000 persons is of no concern.

During the hearings the opponents of this measure dwelt at great length on our home market, and claimed that but only a small percent of our domestic production is dependent upon our export trade. In the aggregate this might appear true, but such claims entirely ignore the fact that in some branches of American agriculture and industry it is of extreme importance and vital to their very existence to maintain and expand our foreign trade.

If my memory serves me correctly, the Republicans in the not far distant past were enthusiastically advocating the expansion of our foreign trade. No less an enthusiast than former President Hoover, for 8 years Secretary of Commerce, in a speech delivered in Boston on October 15, 1928, had this to say:

And today the whole Nation has more profound reasons for solicitude in the promotion of our foreign trade than ever before.

I repeat what I said a moment ago. It is estimated that 7,000,000 are dependent on our export trade for a livelihood.

If this was true when Mr. Hoover said it, how much more weight it has today! During the same speech Mr. Hoover estimated that 2,400,000 families were dependent upon our foreign trade.

Let us examine for a moment and see what foreign markets mean to agriculture and industry in this country. In normal times we export from 55 to 60 percent of our cotton, 40 percent of our tobacco, 30 percent of our lard, 18 to 20 percent of our wheat, as well as many other agricultural products. Unless we make an effort to revive our foreign markets for these products the surplus will continue to mount with its demoralizing influence upon the price structure, as well as militating against the happiness and prosperity of our people.

Unless we expand our foreign markets for many of our industrial products, for which our industries are geared, we will be forced to allow many industries to remain permanently idle, resulting in much additional unemployment.

In normal times we export 40 percent of our typewriters, 29 percent of our printing machinery, 28 percent of our sewing machines, 23 percent of our agricultural machinery, 20 percent of our locomotives, and 14 percent of our automobiles. Many of our manufacturing industries depend upon mass-production methods, whereof a decline in output increases the costs and leads to further unemployment and increased handicaps in marketing their products in our own markets.

Let us examine and see the extent of the decline in our export trade in just a few of our products between 1929 and 1932.

Tobacco declined from 566,000,000 pounds to 411,000,000 pounds; lard declined from 829,000,000 pounds to 546,000,000 pounds; wheat declined from 90,000,000 bushels to 56,000,000 bushels; typewriters declined from 425,000 units to 140,000 units; steam locomotives declined from 207 units to 9 units; automobiles and trucks declined from 536,000 units to 66,000 units.

No one can seriously contend that such declines in the export trade of commodities, which rely so heavily upon foreign markets, would not have a demoralizing effect not only in their respective fields but upon the domestic situation generally. It must be evident that improvement in these industries through an increase in their export opportunities would serve to relieve the acute agricultural and industrial problems we are today enduring.

The development of export trade will mean increased employment and purchasing power in practically every community of the United States.

We cannot have too clearly in mind how sharply our exports have declined. Official figures for 1932 show that our exports of cotton were the lowest, except for 1931, since 1903; of cotton manufactures, the lowest since 1911; of meat products, the lowest since 1870; of animal fats and oils, the lowest since 1889; of wheat and wheat flour, the lowest since 1905; of oil cake and meal, the lowest since 1918; of unmanufactured tobacco, the lowest since 1917; of rubber manufactures, the lowest since 1914; of iron- and steel-mill products, the lowest since 1903; of copper and manufactures, the lowest since 1895; of machinery of all classes, the lowest since 1910; and our exports of automobiles and engines and parts, the lowest since 1915.

Now, let us see how American labor has fared. Immediately following the passage of the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act and the erection of retaliatory trade barriers by the other countries many American industries, in a desperate effort to continue selling in the markets of the world, were forced to establish foreign branch factories. The erection of such branches resulted in displacing American labor and the use of foreign materials instead of our own.

According to a survey by the Department of Commerce, the figures show that approximately $1,220,000,000 of American capital has been invested in foreign branch factories, employing about 330,000 persons. These figures, however, do not include enterprises with investments of less than $50,000, the addition of which would show a much larger investment of American capital and the employment of many thousands of additional foreign laboring men, to the detriment of our own labor.

Certainly in face of such a record every Member of this House, whether he comes from an agricultural or industrial section, should be sympathetic with the President's desire to regain foreign markets.

Unless such markets are again made available to American agriculture, as the Secretary of Agriculture has repeatedly stated, it will mean the removal of approximately forty to fifty million acres of average crop lands, and we must also reconcile ourselves to the necessity of permanently closing down many industrial plants, or at least greatly curtailing their output, and, in addition to idle farms and factories, our shipping and rail facilities must necessarily remain partly idle.

The policy of reciprocity proposed by this bill is not new to the United States. Some would have you believe that this bill is a radical departure from past enactments delegating power to the President. There have been many instances, dating as far back as 1794, where similar and even broader powers have been delegated to the President to regulate or to fix rates affecting commerce. Numerous acts delegating such powers have been enacted, and, as a matter of fact, sections 337 and 338 of the present Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act contains provisions delegating powers to the President equally as broad, if not more so, than those proposed by this bill. As I said before, numerous laws have been enacted, and in the execution of those laws proclamations were issued by Presidents Adams, Jackson, Polk, Fillmore, Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, and Hayes.

It will be noted that irrespective of party affiliations our Presidents have been delegated powers similar to that now proposed.

Reciprocal trade agreements are the only practical means whereby the United States can hope to secure any additional or, in fact, retain our present foreign markets in a world of such rapid economic changes.

During the hearings we were told that many times in recent months cargoes of American products at sea were recalled because of some new over-night import restriction.

That shows how other nations change their laws to the detriment of the United States. After cargoes are out at sea, foreign governments will change their tariffs by executive order, making it necessary for the shipped goods to be recalled.

The United States must not longer delay creating the necessary machinery to enable our Government to quickly meet present-day methods employed by other countries. Our Government must be in a position to give immediate effect to such negotiations as are necessary to assure trading opportunities to American agriculture and industry. Our only hope against increasing restrictions and barriers to American trade is in the adoption of such a measure as now proposed.

The opponents of this bill will endeavor to stress that the sole purpose of this measure is to bring about a reduction of existing tariff rates, and they will entirely ignore the fact that the mere possession of such powers in the hands of the President, as is proposed, will cause foreign nations to exercise some degree of caution in the imposition of further restrictive measures against American trade.

It will be claimed that the passage of this bill will mean the displacement of established American industries.

Such claims and contentions should and will, in my opinion, receive the rebuke of the American people as a gross insult and reflection on the intelligence and high patriotic motives of President Roosevelt.

This bill gives him the same grant of authority with reference to foreign trade that he has already been invested with so far as domestic affairs are concerned. The recovery program cannot be fully effective without this additional grant of authority.

I will now summarize briefly the objectives of this bill.

First. To round out the recovery program. This bill merely gives the President the authority in international trade which the Congress has already vested in him in domestic commerce and trade. The recovery program cannot be fully effective without this additional grant of authority.

Second. To reopen the markets of the world to the products of American farm and factories, or otherwise face the prospect of adopting as permanent the policy of curtailing acreage and of reducing manufacturing capacity in many of our most efficient industries.

Third. To exchange the surpluses which we have built up for surpluses which other countries have accumulated of commodities which we do not produce. Until channels of trade are developed so that these surpluses can move normal recovery in America cannot take place.

Fourth. To plan our commerce and industry so as to direct our labor and resources into the most profitable channels, conducive to American standards of living and efficient and effective production.

Fifth. To provide for the intelligent and enlightened application of the protective principle whereby the maximum opportunity of employment and production may be assured to our industries, large and small alike, as well as agriculture.

Sixth. To provide for mitigation of those irritating restrictions contained in the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act which have antagonized the rest of the world to no purpose and to our serious injury.

Seventh. To put in the hands of the President the only effective instrument for meeting the current international trade situation—an authority no greater than that with which practically every other important commercial power has already equipped its executive department.

Only through reciprocity agreements can America participate in the commercial negotiation in which the rest of the world is busily engaged in a manner detrimental to American agriculture and industry.

Eighth. To rejuvenate world trade which will increase the purchasing power of foreign countries as well as our own people and thereby provide greater opportunity for the sale of American agricultural and industrial products.

Those who oppose this bill insist that it is unconstitutional, and express grave fears that it will work untold injury to American industry, American agriculture, and American labor. My opinion is they have an exactly opposite opinion of this bill, their real fears are that it is constitutional, and that it will work, and that it will be a decided benefit to agriculture, industry, and labor, and that it will promote the welfare of the people, and in case it proves helpful to American business and accomplishes the purpose for which it is intended, our Republican friends realize that the old practice of exchanging Government favors in the way of high tariff benefits for campaign funds is at an end, and that they will no longer be able to fry the fat out of certain favored industries to lubricate the G.O.P. machine. This is the fear that tortures and torments them much more than the fear that the bill is not constitutional or any injury that may result from its enactment.

In conclusion let me say, my friends, that this is not intended as a partisan measure. It was considered in the committee by both Democrats and Republicans. The doors were not closed against the minority, as was the case when the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy bill was written. Everyone was heard, both those in favor of and in opposition to the bill, who requested a hearing, and the small number of witnesses who testified against the measure is, in my judgment, the most conclusive proof of the fact that the people throughout the country, with very few exceptions, are favorable to this legislation. We have brought the bill in under the general rules of the House, we have held no caucus, nor have we applied any gag rule. Any Member is free to offer any amendments he may choose, and vote according to the dictates of his own best judgment on final passage.

I emphasize again that this is a vital and necessary part of the President's recovery program.

I appeal to every Member of this House, and especially every Democrat, and everyone who is willing to aid our President in his earnest and determined fight to relieve the country of the ruin wrought by the economic earthquake which had its inception in 1929 and while very greatly mitigated by the things that have been done, we are still far from complete recovery. Let us look to ourselves well today that we lose not the things that have been wrought, but that we receive the full reward by wholeheartedly giving the President this legislation which he says is indispensable in the consummation and carrying to a successful conclusion the new deal.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman think there is any danger of the reduction of effective tariffs on agricultural products if this power is granted to the President? I am not referring to tariffs that are not effective; I am referring to tariffs on agricultural products, which are effective.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am sure the President will enter into no negotiations or agreements whereby any industry of the United States will be injured.

Mr. HART. The testimony before the Committee on Agriculture by employees of the Department of Agriculture who appeared at the recent sugar hearings indicated that it was the intention to lower the duty on sugar by at least 50 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Can the gentleman point to any such testimony in the hearings?

Mr. HART. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That it was the intention to lower the duty on sugar?

Mr. HART. Yes; for the benefit of Cuba.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not recall any such testimony. The President of the United States is elected by all the people. We Representatives are elected by people of certain districts; the Senators represent States; but the President is elected by all of the people and has the welfare of all the people at heart. He has stated again and again through Secretary Hull, through the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, through Secretary Roper, through Assistant Secretary Dickinson, all of whom earnestly support this bill, that no existing efficient industry would be destroyed, but that certain inefficient, unnecessary industries, perhaps, would not be expanded. He assured us, however, that he would do nothing to injure any efficient American industry.

Mr. HART. The sugar industry was described as one of these inefficient industries; and because it at times paid as high as $200,000,000 taxes into the Treasury it was said to be too much of a tax upon the public.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman show me such testimony before the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does the gentleman refer to the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. HART. No; I refer to the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was not the testimony before our committee. They tried in every way to wring something out of some witness to the effect that some small industry would be crippled or destroyed; but all the testimony was exactly to the contrary.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Does this bill give the President authority to halve, cut in two, any effective tariff upon agricultural products?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman has read the bill. It gives him authority, when he finds certain facts with reference to American agriculture and American industry and American labor, to raise or lower the tariff rates not to exceed 50 percent.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It gives him the same authority he now has under section 336 of the present Tariff Act.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Further in line with the questions asked by the gentleman from Michigan, does not the gentleman from North Carolina remember the testimony of Secretary Wallace before the Ways and Means Committee, in which he answered specifically the inquiry made with reference to the duty on beet sugar by a statement to the effect that the sugar industry was an inefficient industry? He classed it as an inefficient industry and indicated strongly that if he had anything to do with it he would strike off the protective tariff on sugar.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not think there is any such testimony. I do not remember any such testimony.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I will call the gentleman's attention to the top of page 60, where Secretary Wallace testified as follows:

The sugar-beet industry, as measured from the standpoint of free world competition, is inefficient.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Immediately following this statement, Mr. KNUTSON asked the Secretary as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON. And it should be abolished?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say so.

Mr. KNUTSON. Should it?

Mr. WALLACE. I have stood precisely and definitely before the Senate Committee on Finance for maintaining the sugar-beet industry on the basis of 1,450,000 tons, which is the average of the past 3 years. I do not think the sugar-beet industry should be allowed to extend further—

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is the part right there.

Mr. DOUGHTON. There is nothing about destroying the industry there.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Quoting Mr. Wallace:

I do not think the beet-sugar industry should be allowed to extend further, because if it is expanded further it is doing it at the expense of our export agriculture. * * * I think it is unsound economically to allow an industry of that type to expand further at the expense of efficient agriculture.

Mr. DOUGHTON. There is nothing said there about destroying the sugar-beet industry, and nothing stated there that could be so construed. You can pick out some isolated sentence here and there and some little remark and make it the substance of the testimony given. However, Secretary Wallace will not be the man who will have the administration of this law. It will be the President of the United States who, I have heard, has some mind of his own and some courage of his own. We know that he has predicated this whole bill upon the solid foundation that no essential American industry shall be crippled. Its sole purpose is to benefit and alleviate American industry by creating a wider market and bring about an improvement in the welfare of all the people. The gentleman knows that is a fact.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I recognize that the distinguished chairman is an agriculturist and a great friend of agriculture. May I ask him if as a great advocate of agricultural liberty he favors the stand taken by Secretary Wallace with reference to tariffs on agricultural products?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I would have to have his position explained further. I am not in favor of anything that is not fair to American agriculture and which would in any way tend to cripple, injure, or destroy American agriculture. The sole purpose of this bill is to aid agriculture. Agriculture has under this administration made marvelous gains, but this is lost sight of by my friend.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The chairman made a statement to the effect that he did not believe Secretary Wallace would have anything to do with the enforcement of the law.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I said that President Roosevelt would have the last word.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I hope Secretary Wallace will not have anything to do with the enforcement of the law, but owing to the fact he was brought on to testify before the committee, I am led to believe that the facts upon which these proposed tariff agreements will be based will be furnished by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture. Personally, I would much prefer that the Secretary of Agriculture be omitted from this list.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman heard the Chairman of the Tariff Commission testify. This gentleman is in position to know more about tariffs and more about the effect of legislation of this kind than any other one man in the United States. The chairman is a protectionist and a Republican. He was appointed by a Republican President and stated that he would not only give the President this authority but would give him broader authority. The gentleman from Ohio should read all this testimony.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. In that connection, may I say to the distinguished chairman that I would be much better satisfied if this bill carried an assurance that the President would get his facts from the Tariff Commission instead of from someone like Secretary Wallace, who indicates clearly that he is prejudiced.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I can assure the gentleman that no danger will come to American agriculture by this law. I will be glad to disabuse the gentleman's mind of any fears along that line, because it is an imaginary fear and the gentleman is seeing a road full of ghosts where none exist.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman knows very well that the President of the United States cannot possibly be the fact-finding agency in this matter.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The Tariff Commission will have the paramount duty and responsibility in reference to this. In my judgment, the President will rely more upon the Tariff Commission. Of course, he will rely on all the agencies and facilities that will be at his command. He will have the Department of State, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, and every other department of the Government at his disposal, as well as the Tariff Commission, whose sole purpose, sole duty, and sole responsibility is to investigate and make reports and advise the President as to tariff matters.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I refer to one other proposition? We have apparently agreed in this colloquy that the President of the United States cannot make the proper surveys and be the fact-finding agency in this matter. If this is true, and I think it is true, I do not see why we want to pass a law to establish some other fact-finding agency that cannot be as efficient as the fact-finding agency we have, which is the Tariff Commission.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman is looking at it from a partisan standpoint. Right on that point, I may say to my friend that the agricultural situation has improved since this administration came in, and if the fact that agricultural commodities have increased, some having doubled, and the purchasing power of the farmers of this country has been multiplied many millions of dollars, does not convince the gentleman that the policy of the administration, in the administration of this proposed law, will not be in safe hands, then we might argue here until the Judgment Day, and I could not convince the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I ask, if that is true, why do you want any changes?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman has forgotten the chaos and the wreck, the ruin and the havoc and disaster wrought upon this country by the previous administration. I commend that fact to the prayerful consideration of my good friend.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to Secretary Wallace and his testimony, I should like to read into the RECORD at this point a specific statement he made appearing on page 53 of the hearings:

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me, sir, that the essence of the new deal, if I may be permitted to say it, is to take account of human rights. It would seem to me, also, that a man of the character of the President, in administering powers of this sort, would not be so inhuman as to retire in any barbarous way, such as you seem to contemplate, inefficient industries.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Our friend the gentleman from Ohio could not find that in the hearings.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. In that connection our friend has read into the RECORD a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture, and I should like to supplement that, with the permission of the Chairman, by calling his attention to still another one on page 60 of the report of the hearings. I asked the question of Secretary Wallace:

To what extent do you think the cane-sugar industry should be limited or placed under quota?

Mr. WALLACE. You are referring to the domestic cane?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; in Louisiana.

Mr. WALLACE. The same philosophy should apply; there is no difference between the North and the South.

Mr. TREADWAY. You would not approve of the expansion of the growing of cane sugar in Florida?

Mr. WALLACE. I would not, unless it is an efficient industry, and it is clearly not.

These words are what I should like to call to the attention of the House:

They cannot produce as cheaply there as they do in Cuba.

Now, there is the Secretary's yardstick. Because we cannot produce sugar as cheaply as they do in Cuba, he wants to put it under a quota.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is a matter of expansion, which is involved in the Secretary's statement.

Mr. TREADWAY. He wants to put sugar under a quota.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman leaves out of consideration the matter of expansion.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, the fact is that they employ American hands, but this does not seem to bother Secretary Wallace. He thinks we should import our sugar from Cuba.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Everyone knows that the United States does not and cannot produce an adequate supply of sugar.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman if sugar has ever been as cheap as it is under the present tariff rates? Why take away employment from Florida and Michigan and other sugar-producing States?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot yield to my friend for a speech or have him take up my time in that way.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman from Massachusetts should remember all the facts and deal fairly with the Department of Agriculture. In the sugar bill now before the Committee on Agriculture, while it is proposed to reduce the tariff one half a cent a pound on sugar, there is another provision in the same bill that puts the one half a cent back in a processing tax, and Cuba is not benefited at all by that. The beet-sugar grower, however, does get this additional help from the processing tax, like all other agricultural products.

Mr. TREADWAY. Perhaps the gentleman can find some solace in a processing tax that is worthwhile. I have not seen any myself.

Mr. GLOVER. It is a good thing, and we like it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes and should like to proceed without interruption for 20 minutes, and then I shall endeavor to yield for questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the remarks I am about to make will be extremely critical of the principle involved of having Congress abdicate its control of the taxation system of the country, but in making critical remarks I wish to say that they are in no way reflections on the personality of the President of the United States. I hold the President in the very highest esteem. I have voted with him as far as I could, consistently with my conscience, in his program of recovery; but I claim that when our stern convictions differ from those of the President of the United States, there is but one course for us to pursue, and that is to act according to our convictions and belief as to the benefits to be derived from any policy or program that may be suggested to us.

Mr. Chairman, I venture to say that if the American people had been informed of the purposes of this bill as long ago as it appears to have been the intention of the administration to present it, you never would have received as many protests against any other piece of legislation as would have been made against this bill.

Undoubtedly the intention of the administration was in the minds of the leaders at least a year ago, and it was not until the 2d of March that the public and the Congress were notified that that was the intention of the administration.

On that day, the 2d of March, less than 4 weeks ago from the time the bill comes on the floor, the chairman of the committee introduced a bill now known as the "administration bill", and which has the support of the administration.

I submit that the entire American industry and the public should have known the nature of this permission that they are endeavoring to secure at the hands of Congress in order that due preparation could have been made, at least by the Representatives of the people, to defend their rights in the American Congress.

Think of it! On March 5 notices of these hearings were sent out, and they began on March 8, and extended for a little over a week, and here we are today taking under consideration the most important and far-reaching piece of legislation that the administration has so far submitted. If that is not haste and unfair treatment of the American public, I do not know what it is. Why this haste when we have had less than a month to know the purposes of the administration?

Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts of the case are that the passage of this bill through Congress will, I think, complete the Presidential program of assuming complete authority over governmental functions, and will to all intents and purposes do away with further need of the House and Senate. We followed the President last spring at the special session of Congress in his so-called "recovery program." There were things in it we did not want to vote for, but we did because we had confidence in him. That had to do with national matters, domestic matters, so-called. And it placed in his hands en bloc the rights and powers with which Congress was invested by the Constitution pertaining to internal affairs. This bill places the same type of authority in the hands of the President of the United States, as the legislation of the special session gave him over domestic policies, in our relations to international matters. That is what this bill does.

Congress abdicates its right of control over international matters, trade agreements, if you want to call them that, but in reality treaties. You set up the right of the President to make these agreements without consultation or reference to either branch of Congress. That is the international power that you ask to have placed in his hands. It will create a dictatorship, and how else have dictators ever been given power? They have been given it gradually, piecemeal, never all at once, but eventually completing the picture. That is what this bill will do if ever enacted into law. There is my chief criticism of the bill.

In asking for this power the President points to the great decline of our foreign trade since 1929 and expresses the opinion that full and permanent domestic recovery depends in part upon a revival of this trade. It seems to me this is putting the cart before the horse. Rather should he have said that a revival of our foreign trade depends in part upon a revival of our domestic trade.

We normally consume 90 percent of what we produce, and our export trade makes up only 6 percent of our national income. To say that our prosperity is based upon our foreign trade is to say that the tail wags the dog.

The President also states the "American exports cannot be permanently increased without a corresponding increase in imports." Imports of what? Of noncompetitive goods which we do not produce, such as coffee, tea, rubber, raw silk, tin, and so on? Not at all. He demands authority to deal with the articles on the dutiable list and to allow the increased importation of such competitive goods in return for foreign-tariff concessions on American exports. In other words, he proposes to put certain industries out of business in this country in order to gain an export market for the products of certain other American industries. Putting it differently, this bill gives the President the power of life and death over every domestic industry, whether manufacturing or agricultural, and over every section of this country, whether industrial or agricultural.

In this connection let me read a brief item from the New York Journal of Commerce of January 31, 1934, and I want my friends from New England and other Northern Atlantic States to pay particular attention to this. The item is as follows:

ADMINISTRATION REGARDED DETERMINED ON TARIFF PROGRAM

Revelation, by Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins, of administration plans to encourage decentralization of industry is seen in congressional circles as giving credence to the determination of President Roosevelt to seek broad powers to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations.

Admittedly the plan would have the effect of putting some of the big factories in the East out of business, but, in the opinion of Mr. Hopkins, that would be a most desirable end. President Roosevelt has commented upon the congestion in the Atlantic seaboard area and is understood to have advanced the theory that to permit the entry of foreign competitive products would inevitably drive the population into other sections.

It is said that the administration has in mind particularly boots and shoes, textiles, small tools, and cutlery. The feeling is that the South easily can stand the competition from abroad, whereas northern mills cannot live without tariff protection. All of this is a part of a long-range plan intended to change the whole lay-out of American industry.

The item which I have just read contains some slight indication of the power and authority embodied in the right to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations. It is this power and authority which by the pending measure would be lodged in the hands of one man. I contend that any such delegation of authority is absolutely unconstitutional.

Let us go into a little detail. Does it seem right and proper that with such a tremendous power as is asked for in this bill, no information should have been given to the public of the intention? I have already touched on that. Further than that, is it right or proper that these findings should be put into effect without the interested parties given a chance to be heard? It supplements the breaking of the contracts for carrying the air mail. It is another procedure of the same character and description, only worse and more serious. No hearing whatsoever is given to industry in this country, nor are they told what ones are to be selected for sacrifice on the altar of reciprocal trade. No notice of hearings are to be given, no report to industry, no notice as to what industry is to be hit.

I am not an inquisitorial lawyer, I realize, but I tried my best to get information from the various Cabinet members who appeared before us as to what transactions and swapping trades were to be put into effect, and absolutely nothing could you obtain from them, not a word. Let me show you what the author of this bill said. It is credited to the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sayre. He is said to be the author of the bill. I can readily see that gentleman lecturing to a college class—another professor. I said to him, "I wish that all of the 'brain trust' were able as you are", though I do not agree with his views whatsoever. However, he is a brilliant man. I asked Mr. Sayre about these bargaining treaties and agreements. I said:

Could you give us a little more detail? You have been a little more frank than some of the others I have interviewed.

He said:

I don't know that I have, and I don't feel that it is quite possible to reveal the approaches the foreign governments made in confidence to the State Department. I think really, sir, it would not be polite or wise or fair to reveal such approaches as have been made.

Even before this bill is enacted the Assistant Secretary of State admits that they have been approached by foreign governments to enter into these so-called "trades"; swapping transactions, I call them. I then said:

You ask us to take these approaches of foreign governments to a branch of our Government on faith?

Mr. SAYRE. No; not on faith.

I then asked:

What else?

And he said:

On reason.

Whose reasoning? We have no information about it; not the slightest in the world. We must take it on faith. It seems to me that the answer to that is that we are the selected representatives of the people, and it would be much more in keeping for the Secretary of State and his assistant to have faith in the representatives of the people instead of dickering in the dark, so far as Congress is concerned, with foreign governments as to the nature of the trades they were going to effect. I think we ought to be trusted before foreign governments.

I do not go to the extent that some of my Democratic friends do about this smooth language in the bill, and, by the way, I want to refer before I forget it to that language. Read the first page and a half. There is not a conglomeration of words in existence which is more prettily worded and which means less than that page and a half. That page and a half has absolutely no meaning whatsoever. It is nice language. As a witness at the hearings said, "It is a pious prayer." You can see the gentleman, who was educated in Williams College and Harvard University, and who has lectured elsewhere, and you can understand how he could gather up those words that mean nothing. There is no law there of any kind or description, just a set-up that sounds pretty on paper. The only part of the bill that actually means a thing is where it authorizes the President of the United States to make trades with foreign countries in the dark, without confiding to Congress the slightest information. That is the real language to be found in the bill a little further on, but all these whereases and preamble stuff amount to nothing but a pure conglomeration of fancy words.

Why should it not be incumbent on somebody to have a little faith in us? Reference has been made to the fact that we ought to have faith in the President of the United States. We have absolute faith in him individually and personally, but not politically nor in his sound judgment for America's best interest in dealing with our own affairs. Somebody unfortunately has sold this idea of reciprocal trade to the President of the United States; and while Mr. Wallace and Mr. Roper and Mr. Hull all favor reciprocal trades, they do not tell us what we are going to trade. You are asked to have confidence in the President. There are only 24 hours in a day, and the President of the United States has a good many duties to perform during that period of time. Then to say that he is to take the place of the Tariff Commission, that he is to take the place of all witnesses of industry, every possible source of information—that all that responsibility is to be centered in him personally, and to ask us to believe that he will have the ability physically to do these things, I say, is asking us to put too much faith in the President of the United States.

Would not his subordinates have this job on their hands? Who else can do it? Nobody else, and nobody will try to do it; and the President will sit in his office and sign their findings on the dotted line. They will be the real tariff-makers, and the President would be obliged to rely upon them in any action he might take.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are supposed to have such an abiding faith in the wisdom of the President, why can he not have at least an equal amount of faith in us and let us know in advance what changes he proposes to make in the way of trade agreements?

But this is not a part of the plan. We are not to know which article of industry or agriculture has been marked for slaughter until the killing has actually taken place. Not until a trade agreement is made public will the identity of the victim be known. Then, without notice or hearing, the particular branch of industry or agriculture affected will read in the newspapers that its domestic market is to be displaced by a foreign product. Factories will be closed, farms will go to seed, men will be thrown out of work, large investments will be made worthless. Not a pretty picture. The fact that the people concerned, through their representatives in the National Legislature, may voice their objection will not change matters. Their representatives here in Congress, if this bill be passed, will have forfeited their right to object.

Of course, the reason these trade agreements will not be first submitted to Congress for approval is that the administration well knows from past experience that it is difficult to secure congressional approval of trade treaties. Members should bear in mind, if they vote advance approval of the trade agreements by this bill, that they may be voting the death of some industrial or agricultural activity in their district; unimportant, perhaps, in the national picture, but in many cases the lifeblood of a local community.

They should bear in mind that they may be voting hunger and want to their own people by allowing the President to permit the increased importation of the products of some foreign country. With this understanding now, let them not say to their people later on that they did not know what they were doing when they voted for this bill.

Let us consider now the possibility of some of these transactions. I am wondering just what products the President hopes to enable our producers to dispose of abroad, and, what is more important, what is the President going to take in exchange? These questions were put to those representing the administration during the hearings on the bill, but no answer was forthcoming from them. We were told that the details could not be made public; that the subject was too delicate for Congress to handle, and that there were too many diverse interests represented in Congress for it to take a national view of the problems involved.

In other words, we are expected, as I have said, to take this bill on faith, without advance knowledge of what domestic industries are to be sacrificed on the altar of foreign trade.

In response to questions the Secretary of State indicated he would have a downward revision of all "excessive trade barriers", but he gave no definition of such barriers, nor did he indicate any particular rates which he thought came within this category. The inference was that he would reduce every rate which provided sufficient protection to keep out a considerable quantity of foreign importations.

The Secretary of Agriculture suggested that we could sacrifice what he termed the "inefficient" industries in tariff bargaining. These he defined somewhat generally as those small industries which could not meet world competition under lowered tariffs. He also went so far as to mention a few items which he thought might be used for trading purposes, such as the finer textiles, laces, toys, various luxury articles, and articles produced by hand labor. It may interest the people engaged in the sugar-beet industry to know that the Secretary of Agriculture considered this industry inefficient as measured from the standpoint of what he called "free world competition."

The Secretary of Commerce, while not mentioning any particular articles which he thought might be used in the reciprocal trade negotiations, did refer the committee to the report of the Tariff Commission made in response to the Costigan resolution, in which is contained various lists of imported articles classified under such headings as the following:

Articles of which imports have substantially decreased.

Dutiable articles of which the imports are less than 5 percent of domestic production.

Articles on which the tariff rates exceed 50 percent.

Dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages.

The assumption, of course, is that if any of these conditions apply to an article, the tariff should be reduced or removed altogether. If Members of the House will take the trouble to examine this list, they will find that a large part of all the articles covered by the tariff law are included in one list or another.

Now, what benefit is it expected will come to our export industries under this measure? After we reduce our tariffs, and foreign countries rush to ship their products into our markets, thereby driving our own producers out of business, what assurance is there that they will buy any of our products?

The fact is that unless we can undersell the rest of the world, we cannot expect to sell in world markets. That is fundamental.

We do not know what products are to be exchanged under these bargaining agreements, these trade treaties, which I have called "swapping." That word sounds better to me. Does it not take two to make a trade? Did you ever hear of a one-sided trade? Mr. Chairman, do you not think that every country on the face of the globe will be looking out for its best interests in making these trades? What else do they want to trade for but to favor their commerce as against our industries? I am not so confident that those representatives of foreign countries will all be as fair by America as David Harum was in his horse trades. He may have got the better of you—and that is what his game was—but he was square and fair in the end. I do not quite think that our foreign friends are likely to imitate David Harum.

Further than that, suppose we make these trades or swaps, how are we going to force the foreign countries to take American goods in swapping unless they are sold at less than they can buy from other countries? Is there a possible answer to that? They are not coming here through any philanthropy for America and buy our products if they can go to some other country and buy them cheaper. They are not in for that kind of a swap.

Further than that, how is Professor Sayre or his associates going to force these trades on foreign countries? You might reach an agreement to ruin every industry in New England and admit their goods and still not force the industrial people of those foreign countries to buy our goods. They are not going to be forced to buy in a market that may possibly cost them more than elsewhere. That is the kind of a swap we are asked to indulge in.

In this connection it perhaps ought to be understood that if this bill is passed the Government is not going out and buy up all the surplus wheat and cotton and other products and endeavor to trade them for the products of some other country. On the contrary, all that reciprocal trade agreements can do is to provide the avenues by which the nationals of the respective countries may carry on trade under more favorable conditions. Once the avenues are created, they may or may not be used. Many of our exporters will be unable to take advantage of them. As a matter of fact, these avenues will be found to be largely one-way streets into our rich domestic market, which does over one half the world's business and which is the envy of all nations.

We read a great deal about "Buy American." It was a slogan. It went all over the country for months, and now if we pass this bill it will be "Buy foreign goods." I say the title of this bill is not "Amendment to the tariff act." It is a complete change. It should not be entitled "Amendment to the tariff act." It is not. It is a new deal, and the title of the act should be, "Surrender America's interests to foreign competitors." That would be a much more proper title to the bill than to say it is an amendment to the tariff act. It is no such thing.

There has been a great deal said about these various features, that it is not a banking measure, and all that sort of thing. My friends, it is. You do not suppose that any of those foreign countries are going to make any deal with our country that does not involve a reduction of their debt? Secretary Hull said not.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Herald of March 16, with a large headline which reads:

French double tariff levies on United States goods.

And then down in the body of the article it states:

The Government acted under recently granted powers to deal with tariffs. The move was regarded as strategy, through which France hopes to arm herself with a trump card for future trade deals with the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Absolutely. When they talk about retaliatory tariffs it is easy enough to lay them overnight. Fortunately for us, we have a Constitution in this country, and we ought not break it in any such legislation as this proposed. But as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] says, retaliatory tariffs for trading purposes will be proposed by every swapper in foreign lands. Is that not correct?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan—

Mr. TREADWAY. Why not ask me?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how the French Government raised its taxes overnight?

Mr. TREADWAY. By authority of their administration. They have a different system of government, and I am for our system.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. But their system is effective in getting prompt action in changing tariff rates?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I do not agree with the gentleman at all on that finding.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I take it it is self-evident from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; it is not self-evident. It is not correct. It is retaliatory, and they can go among their own neighbors and make any swaps they want to, but when it comes to swapping American rights, we want something to say about it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not evident that the action of the French Government was taken for the sole purpose of deceit?

Mr. TREADWAY. For the sole purpose of preparing for these reciprocal agreements that this administration wants to throw in their laps.

Mr. Chairman, the broad powers conferred upon the President by this bill, if passed, will only enable him to go on a wild goose chase for foreign markets that no longer exist, all at the expense of domestic trade and industry. The world has comparatively little that we want or need, except certain products that we do not produce and which we are already importing. Our trade with Central and South American countries can be expanded only by our admitting the agricultural products of those countries. So far as Europe is concerned, we are almost entirely independent, and any imports from that source would be at the expense of our own industries, whether they remain in the North and East or are transplanted to the South.

We are slow to realize it, but the Old World markets are practically gone. We once had a virtual monopoly of the world wheat market, but that was before Canada, Argentina, and Australia came into the field. Our cotton has been displaced to an increasing extent by that of India, Egypt, Brazil, British East India, and the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan.

We formerly sold our manufactured products to many countries which today, largely with our own machinery, are producing their own goods. Many of the nations of the world which formerly used large quantities of our agricultural products are now raising their own foodstuffs.

These economic developments throughout the world are natural processes of evolution and they bring to mind the great changes which have taken place within our own country during the last century and a half. Their effect is not only to reduce the number of purchasers for the world's goods, but to increase the competition for the remaining markets as well.

The President seeks to expand our exports by increasing our imports. You may increase your purchases from your neighbor, at your own expense, but your neighbor will not increase his purchases from you unless you undersell your competitors, and America, neither North, East, or South, can do that and maintain American standards of living.

At this point I shall include certain excerpts from the testimony of Mr. Samuel Crowther, a brilliant writer and economist, who appeared before the committee in opposition to the bill:

Let us see what foreign trade is. Why do we sell anything abroad? It is to exchange some wealth we have produced for some wealth that someone else has produced, isn't it? * * * Now, if we produce that same wealth here as the foreigner, should we not buy it at home rather than abroad? (Hearings, p. 456.)

The great majority of the industrialists of the country are already agreed that their possible foreign business is of slight consequence as compared with the future of the home market. * * * The really important farm interests, such as the dairy, the cattle, the egg, the fruit, and the vegetable people, depend entirely upon the home market. The wheat farmers and the cotton planters, who now have become less important in the national picture, would like a large export trade as well as a large domestic trade. That, however, is not in nature. (Hearings, p. 452.)

The export trade of the world is going the way of the whaling trade, and there is just as much chance of restoring it as there is of restoring the whaling trade by cutting out electricity and decreeing the world-wide use of sperm oil. The British coal trade with Italy can be reestablished only by destroying Mussolini's new water-power stations. The British cotton trade with India can be brought back only by destroying the Indian cotton fields and mills, which is as reasonable as attempting to close our own southern cotton mills in order to revive the cotton trade of New England. Chile can regain the trade in nitrates only if artificial fixation of nitrogen be prohibited. Germany can regain its chemical trade only if the trades in England, the United States, and Japan are shut down. And so on. (Hearings, p. 449.)

If at the height of our exporting, when we were giving our goods away to foreigners, the amount that we exported made only a trivial proportion of our trade, how can it be that suddenly the foreign trade has taken all-important position in our economy? (Hearings, p. 452.)

I say that if my recital of facts is correct this bill cannot accomplish any of the purposes which it is designed to effect, therefore, the exercise of judgment under it could not be beneficial and might be harmful.

I say that the Congress of the United States should not delegate such a grave matter of domestic policy in the unreviewable judgment of any man, whether he be President or anyone else. (Hearings, p. 463.)

Mr. Chairman, during the course of the hearings on the bill the majority laid great stress upon the fact that so few witnesses appeared in opposition to the measure. The House is entitled to know just how this measure comes before us today.

On March 2 the bill before us, which is admittedly the administration measure, was introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON. On March 5 notices were sent out by the clerk of the committee that hearings would begin on March 8, and informally the chairman stated he hoped they would be concluded by Saturday, March 10.

May I inquire what representatives of the people have appeared in favor of the bill? Those who testified in favor were the President of the United States, through the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, the Assistant Secretary of State, and the Assistant Secretary of Commerce; Mr. Harry Tipper, representing the American Manufacturers' Export Association; Mr. H. E. Miles, representing the Fair Tariff League.

The list of witnesses who appeared in opposition to the bill is as follows: Mr. James A. Farrell, representing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; Mr. John E. Dowsing, representing the United States Potters' Association; Mr. William H. Cliff, representing the Home Market Club of Boston; Mr. James A. Emery, representing the National Association of Manufacturers; Mr. Benjamin C. Marsh, representing the People's Lobby; Mr. Samuel Crowther, economist and writer.

We therefore have a total of 14 witnesses, 6 of them representing the President, on perhaps the most important measure with which Congress has had to deal in a great many years. This is ample evidence that the public has no information that this measure is here. If this legislation is so desirable for the welfare of the people of the country, why have not the people fallen over themselves to get into the hearing room to testify in its favor?

Those who appeared in opposition are representatives of the industrial interests of the country, and the number of employees in these industries runs into the millions. It may at least be said that the weight of evidence pro and con on the bill can be regarded as a 50-50 proposition, with the balance, if any, in favor of the opponents.

I want now to refer very briefly to 336, 337, and 338 of the present law.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield briefly.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Were not James G. Blaine and William McKinley in favor of reciprocity, the very thing that the President is asking?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am glad the gentleman brought up that question, because the yardstick of measurement in their day was such that they did not concede any such right or privilege to the President of the United States as is asked for in this bill. Under these prior reciprocity treaties, Congress either retained the right to approve or reject any treaty entered into or else it laid down in advance the concessions or retaliations the President might use as a basis for negotiation. No legislative or treaty-making power was surrendered.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I know, but in that day the bankers had not robbed the people as they have today.

Mr. TREADWAY. That did not enter into the picture; and there is not any robbery when you are protecting American industry. The international bankers want this bill passed so they can collect the money owed them by foreign countries.

Mr. HART. How about American agriculture?

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me read what Mr. Wallace said on that very subject. I have already read what he had to say in connection with sugar. There is no better illustration than sugar. The Secretary of Agriculture said that we are inefficient in the production of sugar. I recently visited a sugar mill in Florida where 3,000 people would have been out of work except for that sugar factory; where 16,000 acres of cane is being grown that would not have a market except for that plant.

How can Secretary Wallace say it is inefficient when one never could buy sugar cheaper than at present? Although the amount of sugar produced by this one mill in Florida would sweeten the coffee of the people of the United States for only one morning, yet the Secretary of Agriculture does not want that industry in Florida expanded. To my mind, there can be no more ridiculous suggestion than that.

Mr. HART. What I wanted to ask the gentleman about was the farm dollar. How about the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar as compared with the dollar of industry?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the same old question that has been up here for the last 20 years.

Mr. HART. But we are always getting the worst of it on the same levels.

Mr. TREADWAY. Congress invariably has tried to better agriculture; and we are trying today to do it.

Mr. HART. But the tariff is not effective.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, it certainly is not going to be improved by lowering it.

Mr. HART. There is only one thing he can lower it on.

Mr. TREADWAY. If they do not like the tariff, let it be changed by the representatives of the American people. What does the gentleman say to that? Let us do that.

Mr. HART. We are going to do it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Why should we do it this way by putting all this power into the hands of one man?

Mr. HART. Agriculture has always got the worst of it.

Mr. TREADWAY. It will not be bettered through trades.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the question of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER], and the reply of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the effect that there was no yardstick in this legislation, will not the gentleman from Massachusetts point out the difference between the yardstick used in section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act and the yardstick set up in the legislation now before us? I do not want the gentleman to refer to section 4 of the Dingley Act.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am talking about sections 336, 337, and 338. In none of these sections was the power of Congress abdicated, not in the slightest degree. As I understand those sections, the President was distinctly told the limitations within which he could act. This bill places no limitation whatsoever.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman state that under section 3 of the Dingley bill, or under section 338 of the present tariff law, the President was told to come back to Congress for concurrence by the Senate?

Mr. TREADWAY. In the Dingley Act of 1890—

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is the McKinley bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, in this year, under the McKinley bill in 1890.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is not the bill to which I refer.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, we hear a lot about oxtail soup, and we are getting pretty far back.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I point out to the gentleman that under section 3 of the Dingley bill, as well as under section 338 of the present tariff law, the President is not required to secure the concurrence of the Senate; and the same yardstick is provided as in the present bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. To what year does the gentleman refer?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Dingley Act of 1897.

Mr. TREADWAY. In every principal provision of that act definite limitations were prescribed. Blanket authority has never been granted the President of the United States and we are not willing to give it to him now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Blanket authority was granted by section 3 of the Dingley bill. Section 4 gives specific authority.

Mr. TREADWAY. Under section 3 of the Dingley bill Congress laid down specific duties on designated articles which the President could impose in case of discriminations by foreign countries which exported those products to the United States. Under section 4 the President was given broad treaty-making powers, but any treaty he made had to have both the concurrence of the Senate and the approval of Congress.

At this point I shall include these provisions of the act of 1897, so that there may be no question as to what they provide.

RECIPROCITY SECTIONS OF THE DINGLEY TARIFF ACT, EFFECTIVE JULY 24, 1897

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines and vermouth; paintings and statuary; or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country or colony producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude, 5 percent ad valorem.
 Brandies or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, $1.75 per proof gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, in bottles containing not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint, $6 per dozen; containing not more than 1 pint each and more than one half pint, $3 per dozen; containing one half pint each or less, $1.50 per dozen; in bottles or other vessels containing more than 1 quart each, in addition to $6 per dozen bottles on the quantities in excess of 1 quart, at the rate of $1.90 per gallon.

Still wines and vermouth, in casks, 35 cents per gallon; in bottles or jugs, per case of 1 dozen bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint, or 24 bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 pint, $1.25 per case, and any excess beyond these quantities found in such bottles or jugs shall be subject to a duty of 4 cents per pint or fractional part thereof, but no separate or additional duty shall be assessed upon the bottles or jugs.

Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary, 15 percent ad valorem.

The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in this section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country or colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States, coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans into the United States as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend by proclamation to that effect the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans of the products of such country or colony for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products or exports, direct or indirect, from such designated country, as follows:

On coffee, 3 cents per pound.
 On tea, 10 cents per pound.
 On tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, 50 cents per pound; vanilla beans, $2 per pound; vanilla beans commercially known as "cuts", $1 per pound.

Sec. 4. That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall, within the period of 2 years from and after the passage of this act, enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States and their use and disposition therein, deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and in such treaty or treaties, in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of the duties imposed by this act, to the extent of not more than 20 percent thereof, upon such goods, wares, or merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this section provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of this act to the free list thereof of such goods, wares, and merchandise, being the natural products of such foreign country or countries and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of this act during a specified period, not exceeding 5 years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise not included in said free list as may be designated therein, and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country with which such treaty has been made shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty and none other.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. I want to answer a question which has not been answered, namely, why the sugar mill which the gentleman visited recently in Florida is inefficient?

Mr. TREADWAY. I claim it is not.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Secretary Wallace gave as the reason in his testimony before the committee, the fact that they cannot produce sugar as cheaply there as they can in Cuba.

Mr. TREADWAY. I quoted that in answer to the question of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]. There is the whole issue in the very language of the Secretary of Agriculture. Because we cannot produce sugar as cheaply; because we will not ask our agricultural employees to work under the conditions existing in the half civilized regions of the interior of Cuba, we are asked to compete with their prices.

I prefer that we expand our home industries before looking after our foreign friends and neighbors, even though they be just across the channel.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would the gentleman please explain what ex-Secretary Mills meant by referring to inefficient industries?

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not hear the gentleman's speech; and when he made the speech, he was not an official of the Government. I am quoting from Democratic Government officials today; I am quoting from the present Secretary of Agriculture, the present Secretary of Commerce; and while I have the highest regard for Mr. Mills, he is not an official of the Government today and I am not interested in any way, shape, or manner in his unofficial statements.

Mr. DOUGHTON. He knows something about industry. He recognizes that there are inefficient industries in the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Why did not the gentleman from North Carolina show more interest in Mr. Mills' theories when he was Secretary of the Treasury? The gentleman was doing the best he could to defeat him all the way. When he goes out into the country and makes a speech that has no official authority, the gentleman from North Carolina is terribly interested in his viewpoint.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I wish the gentleman would verify the statement that I was trying to defeat anything Mr. Mills was doing.

Mr. TREADWAY. I never saw very much support for Mr. Mills on this side of the House when he was talking about the tariff. I did not see any great support for his theories later on when he became Secretary of the Treasury. I do not think the gentlemen on this side of the House showed any interest in Mr. Mills other than to criticize him.

Mr. HART. Mr. Mills learned something last fall.

Mr. TREADWAY. You gentlemen will learn something this fall and 2 years from this fall if you enact this bill into law.

Mr. HART. We should worry about that.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not worrying. I assure the gentleman I am not worrying a particle.

I quote in connection with the flexible tariff provisions of the present law the opinions of some of our associates on this side. Our distinguished chairman has quoted an ex-official. I desire to quote something that was actually said on this floor.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. May I quote something that was said on this floor when the question of a flexible tariff provision was before the House?

Mr. MAY. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he yield? In the first part of the gentleman's speech he made a general statement indicting the administration and the leadership of the House for not giving the country an opportunity to be heard on this bill. May I call attention to the fact that on page 266 there is a statement by Harry Tipper, executive vice president of the American Manufacturers' Export Association?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; with emphasis on the word "export."

Mr. MAY. May I emphasize something also?

Mr. TREADWAY. His testimony was not worth anything.

Mr. MAY. He says he has 300 memberships in 300 different communities.

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly, and all of them are exporters.

Mr. MAY. There are filed with his statement a number of briefs representing various industries.

Mr. TREADWAY. All right. If the gentleman wants to quote from the testimony given before the committee, may I quote what Mr. Emery said, representing the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States? I will put this in the RECORD for the benefit of the gentleman:

It cannot be believed, however, that the President should be authorized to conclude such agreements as are here proposed and make them effective without reference to Congress.

I insert at this point some further extracts from Mr. Emery's testimony:

Mr. Chairman, to state the propositions I desire to present to the committee I beg to offer this view of the tariff committee of our association: That it has every confidence in the good faith and high intelligence of the President. It believes he should be authorized to negotiate any trade agreements that may advance the foreign commerce of the United States, without restriction as to articles removable to or from the free list; but it cannot believe, however, that the President should be authorized to conclude such agreements as are here proposed and make them effective without reference to Congress (a) because it doubts it to be a valid exercise of what it believes is a treaty-making power and (b) because the industries affected should have knowledge of proposals vitally affecting not only their employing capacity but perhaps their very existence. They should, therefore, have at some point a day in court, and none is provided here in this bill.

They are of the opinion that in the present uncertain economic situation at home and abroad a definite limit should be placed upon any trade treaty, particularly because of the instability of currency in the general rapid change in economic conditions, which from time to time create circumstances necessitating the termination of agreements upon due but fairly short notice.

Finally, they assert particularly at the present time the necessity of maintaining reasonable methods of protection where demonstrable foreign competition adversely threatens American industries and their capacity for employment. Our major depression problems are emphatically domestic and should receive primarily our major attention. (Hearings, p. 395.)

I trust the committee will not understand in speaking for our tariff committee that I am depreciating in the least the advantages of foreign trade. But I do wish to insist upon making clear a comparison between jeopardizing the vast domestic trade of the United States enjoyed to such an extraordinary degree by its own people and the possibilities of foreign trade, which in many directions are limited by the facts of our importation and experience. (Hearings, p. 398.)

I will also quote some extracts from the testimony of James A. Farrell, representing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States:

The organizations of the chamber of commerce have long adhered to the principle that there should be "reasonable protection for American industries subject to destructive competition from abroad and which are of benefit to any considerable section of the country." This, we think, should be the first consideration. Reciprocal tariff negotiations should be secondary to the first. (Hearings, p. 126.)

In closing, may I reiterate the three recommendations we have to make:

First, that in granting authority to make tariff changes in the interest of reciprocal tariff negotiations the Congress write into the law the definite limitation that no rate be lowered to a point where American industry and agriculture shall be subjected to destructive foreign competition.

Second, that the flexible provisions of the tariff act be maintained, embodying a basic controlling formula laid down by the Congress, according to which shall be determined the adequate protective level at which individual tariff rates shall be set.

Third, that through a tariff-adjustment board, or other instrumentality, and in advance of such board making its recommendations to the President, there be full opportunity for American businesses likely to be affected by contemplated reciprocal tariff or other tariff changes to present testimony as to the incidence upon their respective enterprises of such changes. (Hearings, p. 140.)

Mr. TREADWAY. * * * You are not then in sympathy with the idea that has been expressed here of the possibility of doing away with some of our own industries here in order to get goods in from other countries?

Mr. FARRELL. No, sir. (Hearings, p. 149.)

There are many other statements of a similar nature. I could quote a lot more.

I could also quote what Secretary Wallace said, showing that he wants to keep down American products and not permit them to expand. Is that a good American policy?

Mr. Chairman, I represent an industrial district in New England. We have small industries. We ask for their continuation and expansion, and not for their contraction and destruction.

Mr. MAY. Are any of them exporters?

Mr. TREADWAY. I hope they are. May I say that we consume over 90 percent of our entire products in this country. This Congress, under the leadership of the Democratic Party, seems more interested in the small remainder of less than 10 percent than in the 90 percent. There is the real question.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. In view of the statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts up to this time, may I ask if he favors expansion of our foreign trade?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do; but not at the expense of our domestic production. The gentleman cannot show me any way that we can reciprocate trade under the bill and not take it away from our local production. I have requested on this floor and at home of people who wanted tariff rates the information as to articles on which they wanted the rates changed. Secretary Hull talked to us about trade barriers; but when I interrogated him as to details and opportunities—nothing doing.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman tell us what his plan is for the expansion of our foreign trade?

Mr. TREADWAY. It we were put in authority, we certainly would not pass this bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the N.R.A. is making it extremely difficult for small business?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. Even yesterday the paper contractors refused to bid on Government paper and would not allow the Government the previous price owing to the N.R.A. The two bidders, it happens, were both from the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What percentage of the products we consume in this country is imported?

Mr. TREADWAY. I can find that out, but I cannot give the gentleman the figure at this time.

Mr. SINCLAIR. About 8 percent.

Mr. TREADWAY. Probably less than 10 percent. We are a fairly good self-centered country except to the extent of articles that climatic conditions will not permit to be raised here. May I make reference to boards of trade, foreign agents, and so forth? May I read a telegram that I received since I have been on the floor? This is from Boston, signed by George L. Barnes, president of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts:

BOSTON, MASS., March 23, 1934.

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,

House Office Building:

On behalf of industry of this State we protest vigorously the proposal to grant Executive authority to enter into trade agreements that may profoundly affect all the industries of our State without an opportunity to know the character of the agreement proposed or to have it considered and discussed by the Senators from our State as all similar proposals in the past have been, as a part of the treaty power. We are deeply interested in promotion of foreign trade, but we are unwilling to risk our domestic markets in an exchange of which we have no knowledge and no opportunity to present and protect our employees or the investors in our industries. We believe the enactment of such authority would enormously multiply the already serious elements of uncertainty which our industries face. We, therefore, urge opposition to the measure in its present form or its amendment to assure that treaties negotiated in trade terms shall be offered to the Senate for examination before ratification.

GEORGE L. BARNES,
President Associated Industries of Massachusetts.

This is the kind of testimony I get from home. The Home Market Club, representing the industries of New England, is on record with very strong resolutions against this bill. I include at this point a resolution passed by that organization:

Resolution passed at a meeting of the Home Market Club, at Boston, Mass., March 14, 1934

Whereas the success of the National Industrial Control Act is based upon nationalism; and

Whereas the national economic situation is vastly improved; and Whereas industry is the predominant factor in developing employment; and

Whereas American producers, in seeking relief from destructive foreign competition, must proceed through section 3, paragraph (e), of the National Industrial Control Act; and

Whereas under the terms of the proposed reciprocal tariff legislation (H.R. 8430), importers and exporters would be granted greater advantages, in the nature of speedier relief, than American producers now enjoy: Be it

Resolved, therefore, That the Home Market Club is unalterably opposed to the theory advanced in H.R. 8430; that it cannot support a measure that delegates a power which, by the stroke of a pen, might readily be the means of wiping American industries out of existence; that if, in the final analysis, the Congress does transfer its constitutional legislative powers to the Executive, the Home Market Club requests that prior publication be made of all articles of American production entering into proposed reciprocal agreements and that the right of protest and review be reserved for American industry.

I also include a telegram I have just this afternoon received from the Manufacturers Association of Meriden, Conn., and also one from E. Kent Hubbard, of Hartford, Conn.:

MERIDEN, CONN., March 23, 1934.

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House Office Building:

Meriden industry feels that H.R. 8430 is a distinct threat to continuance of manufacturing in this section and an unfair bartering of legislative power granted in Constitution. This bill can only increase unemployment in New England and hamper a recovery. As a New Englander we urge you to heed the pleas of a region that is already suffering under handicap, and request you to oppose reciprocal-tariff proposal.

MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION OF MERIDEN,
W. J. WILCOX, Secretary.

HARTFORD, CONN., March 23, 1934.

Congressman ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Ways and Means Committee Hearing Room:

Had intended to make personal appearance H.R. 8430, which now is impossible. As Democrat and industrialist and as one vitally interested in recovery, have done everything possible to further the aims of the administration. However, no administration and no Government should so completely disregard section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution as to place in the hands of one man, however competent and trustworthy, the power of life and death over industry. It is not my intention to be intemperate in my statements, but I cannot conceive that the Congress, which directly represents the people of the country, would be willing by affirmative action to relieve itself of this sacred trust. Please do not confuse the proposal contained in 8430 with the entirely opposite idea of flexible provisions contained in the tariff act now in force.

E. KENT HUBBARD.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I hope the gentleman may have all the time he wants.

Mr. TREADWAY. In fairness to my colleagues I cannot take too much time.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think the gentleman should debate this matter fully.

How is it we can sell more goods to foreign countries that already owe us so much money? Are we willing to sell them more goods, and how can they pay for them if we do sell them additional merchandise?

Mr. TREADWAY. A very distinguished economist was asked that question in the course of the hearings, Mr. Samuel Crowther.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is the reason I have asked the question.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Crowther was asked the question whether or not the debts owed us were in any way involved, and he said they were intricately involved, and that you could not consider it otherwise than whether they were going to ship goods into this country to reduce their public debt or else, as they are now doing, only pay us a token of good will rather than even pay the interest they owe us.

Theoretically, Mr. Hull may be absolutely right that the public debts owed us are not involved, but as a Yankee proposition the gentleman from Cape Cod knows better, and the rest of us also.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield and explain how they are involved in this bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, my dear friend, if you owed me $10 and you shipped me some of those good Washington State or Oregon apples, that do not begin to be as good as our New England ones, and I buy them of you, do you think I am going to pay you in cash? I am going to charge it against your account just as sure as you ship me those apples or salmon or any other product you may have.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Just how can you charge that against my account?

Mr. TREADWAY. You would find out mighty quick if you owed me the price of them.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The transaction is between individuals and not between governments.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, well, the government is made up of individuals, and you need not think those boys across the ocean are going to deal with this Government any differently than their own people would deal individually.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Is there any legitimate objection to making it easier for those people to pay their debts through legitimate commerce?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; there is most serious objection if it affects American production, which it will, because it cannot help it. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes, and I shall ask not to be interrupted.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I simply suggest that the way Germany allows her nationals to pay their bills answers the question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

I now want to refer to the attitude of the Democratic Party on this question of flexible provisions of the tariff. On May 15, 1929, the subject was before the House, and the gentleman from Georgia, one of the ablest men we ever had on the Ways and Means Committee, made this statement, and I am quoting Mr. Crisp, at page 1349 of the RECORD:

Gentlemen, think what a potential power the power to make tariff rates would be in an election year—to let the President of the United States have the right to write a tariff bill. Stop and think about it. Do you think there would be any dearth of campaign contributions—

And so forth.

Then, during the same debate the present distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said:

The fathers who framed the Constitution wisely, in my opinion, left to Congress the initiating and enacting of laws raising revenue—

And so forth.

He continued with the following observations on the centralization of power in the Executive:

In my opinion, we have gone a long way too far already in the centralization of power in the Executive head of the Government. The President of the United States is now Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and with the great concentration of power lodged in him, giving him indirect control over the railroads and the transportation system of the country through the Railroad Commission, control of the air communication by the Radio Commission, control of the navigable streams and water power, control of the finances of the country through the Federal Reserve Board and Farm Loan Board, and now domination over agriculture through the proposed new Farm Board with a $500,000 revolving fund, every dollar of which will be expended by appointees of the President, and if this bill is enacted into law he will have the power of life and death over industry, all manufacturing enterprises, and complete autocratic power affecting agriculture.

The gentleman was worried at that time over the centralization of power in the Executive, but as we all know now, he had not "seen nothin' yet."

Continuing, he said:

My friends, this is too dangerous and alarming to contemplate. With all this power vested in the President of the United States, he becomes a colossus. It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man who ever has been, is now, or ever will be, President of the United States. In fact, with all this unrestricted and unlimited power he would be in a better position to overthrow our form of government and proclaim himself king than was the First Consul of France, the great Napoleon, when he overthrew the French Government and proclaimed himself Emperor.

It seems that the more power men are given the more they are obsessed with a morbid gluttony for increased power. My friends, it is time to pause and call a halt, to stop, think, look, and listen before we go over the yawning precipice just ahead of us.

Then the present Vice President of the United States, another distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee at that time, said:

I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes. Remember this, gentlemen, when the legislative body surrenders its tariff powers and obligations to the Executive—

What could be more definite than this?—

under our system of government, a majority can do that, but you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate—

And so forth.

Of course, these little statements, and others similar to them, do not bother the present Democratic majority a particle, although they are asking us to vote a greater power than they were unwilling to grant when the Republican Party was in power. The question is, Whose ox is being gored?

However, I want particularly to call the attention of the House to an item inserted in the RECORD of October 2, 1929, signed by these distinguished gentlemen, and I shall quote it. The signers are Furnifold M. Simmons, of North Carolina; Pat Harrison, of Mississippi; William H. King, of Utah; Walter F. George, of Georgia; David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts; Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky; Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma; and Tom Connally, of Texas. Every one of them, except the first one, Mr. Simmons, is still serving in another branch, and they are on record against a flexible provision less stringent than the one you are asked to vote on at the present time. The statement follows:

JOINT STATEMENT ISSUED BY DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ATTACKING PRINCIPLE OF PERMITTING PRESIDENT TO PASS UPON TARIFF RATES

September 29, 1929, the eight Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee issued a public statement in which they attacked the principle of permitting the President to pass upon tariff rates as being unconstitutional and a menace to the democratic form of government. The statement follows:

"A question of far-reaching consequence transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called 'flexible provisions' of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

"The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

"Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

"Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

"There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had or may have extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he President or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, intrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizen through taxation. If proof were needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

"The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

"The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

"An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake, any trading or log-rolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of and emphasis upon the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

"No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

"For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

"We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

"It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff, and regulation of commerce thereby, will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress where it is such an embarrassing business, as everyknow knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

"In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

"In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad, a public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

"FURNIFOLD M. SIMMONS, of North Carolina.

"PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi.

"WILLIAM H. KING, of Utah.

"WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia.

"DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts.

"ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky.

"ELMER THOMAS, of Oklahoma.

"TOM CONNALLY, of Texas."

Now, one other quotation—on May 19, 1932, the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, then a member of the other legislative body, said:

I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the tariff act and demand its speedy repeal. I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision, with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

How are these distinguished gentlemen going to square themselves in supporting or voting for this bill?

Mr. Chairman, so far as the constitutionality of the bill is concerned, the report of the committee asserts that it "goes no further than many previous enactments", and in fact "follows a current of legislation" enacted from the earliest times. With this statement I cannot agree. Any-one carefully analyzing the precedents will at once see that there is a marked and fundamental difference between those prior acts to which reference is made and what is proposed by the bill.

The Supreme Court has many times held that under the division of governmental powers outlined by the Constitution, it is a breach of that instrument for Congress to delegate its legislative powers to the Executive. The question, then, in every case is whether legislative powers are conferred.

What does the bill provide? It authorizes the President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States, to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign governments and to proclaim such modifications of existing duties, and so forth, as are required or appropriate to carry out any such agreement entered into by him. It is further provided that no proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing an existing duty by more than 50 percent or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

The proponents of the bill allege that this language lays down a yardstick governing the President in carrying out the declared purpose of Congress to expand the export trade of the United States, and that therefore his power is administrative and not legislative. It is said that this supposed rule is similar to that provided in section 336 of the present tariff law, commonly known as "the flexible tariff provision." But let us compare the two.

Under the flexible tariff provisions it is provided that, in order to put into force and effect the policy of Congress set forth in the tariff act, the Tariff Commission, upon request of the President, upon resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, upon its own motion, or upon the request of any interested party when there is good and sufficient reason therefor, shall investigate the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article and shall report its findings to the President. If the Commission finds that the duties expressly fixed by statute do not equal the differences in such costs of production, it is required to specify in its report such increases or decreases in rates as it finds to be necessary for that purpose. Upon receipt of the report of the Commission the President is required to approve the rates of duty specified therein if in his judgment such rates of duty are shown by the investigation of the Commission to be necessary to equalize the differences in the costs of production.

Thus, in effect, Congress declares in section 336 that the tariff rates shall be x minus y , with x equaling the domestic cost of goods and y the foreign cost. Under these circumstances Congress writes the law when it lays down this legislative rule, and the President merely carries it into execution. Such was the finding of the Supreme Court in the case of J. W. Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. the United States (276 U.S. 394), in which the Court said:

The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

The above language was quoted by the committee in its report, but it is significant that the report omitted the language which immediately followed. The Court continued:

If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person, or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire whether under the present bill any intelligible principle is laid down to which the President, in fixing tariff rates, is directed to conform. The bill provides that the President shall first find that existing duties are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States. But when does a duty unduly burden foreign trade? Does Congress lay down any formula to govern the President in determining this question? Is it even such a matter as can be determined as a fact, and might not opinions differ as to what constituted an undue burden? In other words, does not the President have complete discretion in determining this matter? And in any event is not his determination of this question merely a condition precedent to the exercise of his real powers under the bill, namely, to enter into reciprocal trade agreements and to modify existing rates to conform to such agreements?

Now, what rule does Congress lay down in the bill to guide the President in fixing rates? Does it provide that such rates shall be computed according to a definite legislative formula, similar to that laid down in the flexible-tariff provisions? No. It merely authorizes him to proclaim such modifications in existing duties as are required or appropriate to carry out the agreements which he has entered into with foreign countries. We may ask, then, what legislative rule governs the President in his negotiation of those agreements? Again we find no policy laid down. In making concessions to foreign countries, and in selecting the article to be used as a basis for bargaining, the President is governed only by his own discretion. The finding he must make that the existing tariff rates are unduly burdening our foreign trade is only a condition precedent to the exercise of that discretion. Similarly, the provision that he may not change an existing rate by more than 50 percent is only a limit to his discretion.

It is noteworthy that the advocates of the bill do not rest their argument in favor of its constitutionality wholly upon its alleged analogy to the flexible provisions. They also cite as alleged precedents many previous acts of Congress running back as far as 1794. It so happens that the act of 1794 authorized President Washington to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States whenever in his opinion the public safety required. However, that act is no precedent for the pending bill. The distinction between such a delegation of authority and that contained in the bill has been well stated by Judge Ranney, of the Ohio Supreme Court, in a case which has often been cited with approval by the United States Supreme Court (C. W. & Z. R.R. Co. v. Clinton County Commissioners, 1 Ohio State, 88). In that case, in explaining the difference between delegating legislative authority and administrative authority, Judge Ranney said:

The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law.

Applying this holding to the act of 1794, the President's discretion there was only as to the execution of the law, and was not, therefore, a prohibited delegation of legislative authority. But in applying the holding to the present bill, we find that the President's discretion goes both to the making of the law and its execution. This difference the proponents of the bill either ignore or fail to perceive.

The reciprocity provisions of the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890 are also cited as an alleged precedent for the delegation of authority contained in the present bill. However, there is absolutely no analogy between the two measures. Under the 1890 act, Congress placed sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides upon the free list, but authorized the President, if he found that any country producing and exporting any such articles to the United States imposed unequal or unreasonable duties on the products of this country, to suspend the free entry of such articles and impose thereon certain rates of duty which were fixed by Congress in the act.

In upholding the constitutionality of this law in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649), the Supreme Court pointed out that the legislative authority of Congress was exercised when it declared that the free entry of the articles was to be suspended, and certain specified duties imposed upon a certain-named contingency.

What the President was required to do—

Said the Court—

was simply in the execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency and that in case of such suspension certain duties should be imposed.

Applying this decision to the present bill, it must be evident to anyone that the 1890 act is not to be compared with the delegation of authority which is here proposed. In that act Congress fixed in advance the rates of duty which were to be put into effect upon the happening of a certain contingency. Under the bill, the President himself fixes the rates.

Similar provisions in the act of 1897 are also cited as a precedent for the bill, but the same distinction may be made as in the case of the act of 1890. The act of 1897 also authorized the President to negotiate reciprocal tariff treaties with foreign countries by granting reductions of duty of not more than 20 percent in return for equivalent concessions by such countries, but it was provided in the act that before becoming operative any such treaties must first have been approved by both the House and Senate. Hence this provision of the act cannot be cited as a precedent for delegating tariff-making authority to the President.

The Tariff Act of 1909 was also referred to in the committee's report as a precedent for the present bill. Under that act Congress set up two schedules of duties, a maximum and a minimum, and made the maximum schedule of general application. At the same time it gave the President authority to put the minimum schedule in effect with respect to any country which he found did not discriminate against the products of this country. Here, again, the President had no power to fix rates of duty such as he is given under the pending bill.

So far as the reciprocity provisions of the Tariff Act of 1913 are concerned, they gave the President no legislative authority since any agreements he might have negotiated thereunder were required to be submitted to both the House and Senate for approval before becoming operative.

Now, as to sections 337 and 338 of the present tariff law, which have been mentioned as delegations of tariff-making authority to the President. What are the facts? Under section 337 the President is authorized, whenever the existence of unfair methods of competition or unfair acts in the importation of articles into the United States shall be established to his satisfaction by the Tariff Commission, to direct that the articles concerned in such unfair methods or acts shall be excluded from entry. To assist the President in making his finding the Tariff Commission is authorized and directed to investigate any alleged unfair methods or acts and to conduct public hearings. Provision is also made for judicial appeal to the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. It will be noted, however, that the President exercises no legislative power under these provisions since he is simply authorized to put into effect the declared legislative policy of Congress that certain articles shall be excluded from entry upon the finding by him that a certain state of facts exists.

Under section 338 it is provided that the President shall by proclamation specify and declare "new or additional" rates of duty, as thereafter provided, upon foreign articles when he finds as a fact that the country of exportation imposes certain discriminations against the commerce of the United States. It is also provided that the President may exclude foreign articles from entry upon the finding by him of certain other foreign discriminations. In fixing the amounts of the new or additional duties which are provided for, the President is bound by the rule therein laid down by Congress that such duties shall offset the burden or disadvantage to our commerce in the foreign country, or the benefit to a third country. In other words, he does not merely exercise his discretion but applies a definite yardstick laid down by Congress. Under the bill no yardstick for fixing rates is provided.

So far as the precedents are concerned, then, it may be said that Congress has never granted a President such complete authority and discretion over the tariff as does the present bill. In no case has Congress given the President the authority to enter into executive agreements with foreign relations relative to the tariff without first laying down in advance the precise concessions or retaliations which he might use as a basis for bargaining, or else requiring that any agreement before becoming operative must be ratified by both the House and Senate. In no case has Congress given the President discretionary authority in rate making.

The present bill does not grant authority to the President merely to put into effect a policy of Congress under a rule of conduct laid down by it in advance. On the contrary, it grants him the authority to make his own rule by which tariff rates are to be fixed and commerce with foreign countries carried on—a rule determined by private agreement with foreign countries, and which may be put into effect at the will of the Executive, transformed into a lawmaker. No European dictator has greater power to affect the future life of his subjects than is thus given to the President of the United States.

It has long been said that the protective tariff never closed a domestic factory nor threw a worker out of employment. If the Democratic proposal to tear down the tariff would create jobs for our unemployed, it might be justified. However, such a program is not calculated to open up possibilities for employment but rather to reduce them. The price which we have to pay to sell more goods abroad is too great to result in any net benefit to this country. We have everything to lose and nothing to gain. Our rich domestic market, the greatest in the world, would be sacrificed in order to enlarge our relatively small foreign trade. For a chance to increase our present export trade of one and one half billion dollars per year we are asked to throw open our home market to foreign competition—a market which in 1929 produced a national income of approximately $90,000,000,000.

Those who are advocating the reciprocity proposal may try to say that at the present time American workers have nothing to lose by being thrown into competition with labor in other countries. Nothing could be further from the truth. In spite of the fact that millions are out of employment, the wage scale of those who still have jobs is above that of any other country in the world; and when prosperity returns, as some day it must, the men who are put back to work will receive this higher wage scale, provided, in the meantime, the maintenance of the American standard of living has not been made impossible as a result of destroying the protective tariff system. But in any event, how can buying more textiles from the United Kingdom reopen our own textile plants? How can buying more steel goods from Germany give employment to our own steel workers? How can buying more wheat, milk, and other agricultural products from Canada help our American farmers? How can buying more meats from Argentina be of any assistance to our own cattle raisers? How can buying more shoes from Czechoslovakia put our own shoe factories back on the road to prosperity? How can buying more fruits and vegetables from Caribbean countries put any more money in the pockets of our own producers of these foodstuffs? My friends, such a question answers itself.

In closing, I would just like to quote an old tariff slogan, which I think is particularly apropos of the present bill:

Lower tariff means more imported goods.
More imported goods means less goods made in the U.S.A.
Less goods made in U.S.A. means less work.
Less work means more unemployment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POLK] such time as he may desire.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and include two brief excerpts from the Commissioner of Education.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for time today to call the attention of the House to the bill (H.R. 7059) introduced in the House by Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi and by Senator GEORGE in the Senate.

The purpose of this legislation is to continue Federal aid for the teaching of vocational agriculture, home economics, and trades and industries education as has been carried on under the so-called "George-Reed Act" which expires this year. This bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Education on March 2, and I hope we may have the opportunity of voting on it within the near future.

I am particularly interested in this proposed legislation because I know something of the educational work for which this money is used. This proposed legislation provides for an appropriation, for a period of 3 years, of the sum of $1,000,000 for each of the three subjects—agriculture, home economics, and trades and industries.

As is pointed out by the Committee on Education in the report on this bill, appropriations for vocational education are carried under two heads. First, under the permanent legislation of the Smith-Hughes Act, which was passed in 1917, and, second, under the George-Reed Act, which was passed in 1929. This latter act was enacted for a period of 4 years and thus expires this year. The legislation proposed in H.R. 7059 is for the purpose of continuing the George-Reed Act for another period of 3 years.

For some reason which I am unable to explain the Federal appropriations for vocational education have been severely cut during the past 2 or 3 years below the amounts authorized by Congress under the George-Reed Act.

For example, this act specifically appropriated $1,500,000 for vocational education in 1932 and $2,000,000 for the same purpose in 1933, while actually only $1,483,000 was made available in 1932 and $1,275,000 in 1933. In addition to this, the permanent appropriations for vocational education received the same cut which was given to most other appropriations by the so-called "Economy Act" of last year.

In his annual report for 1933 the Commissioner of Education states, with reference to the reduction in Federal, State, and local revenues available for vocational education, that:

In this year, as compared with the year preceding, some $3,276,000 less money was invested in these schools. Opportunities offered for vocational training were correspondingly reduced, and funds were not available for promoting vocational education in new areas, however urgent the need might be in such areas for widening the range of vocational training to embrace new occupations.

In the same report, on page 10, the Commissioner has summarized the effects which will result if the George-Reed funds should be discontinued; in other words, the effects which will result if the George-Ellzey bill (H.R. 7059) is not passed before Congress adjourns. I quote:

State directors indicate the following consequences as inevitable if the George-Reed funds should be discontinued: (1) That many departments of vocational agriculture and a majority, if not in some States all, departments of home economics, will be eliminated; (2) that State funds already appropriated and contingent on the receipt of Federal funds will of necessity lapse; (3) that it will not be possible to utilize buildings and equipment specially provided for vocational departments of agriculture and home economics representing large expenditures of public funds; (4) that elimination of vocational work will result in still further overloading of academic courses, with the consequent impairment of the work of the entire school system; (5) that rural communities will be even more severely taxed than they are now to meet the increased load if Federal support is withdrawn; (6) that contributions made by vocational departments under the George-Reed Act to relief and recovery programs in farming and home making will be abandoned; (7) that States will be unable to provide vocational training for large numbers of the unemployed; (8) that unemployment will be increased by discharge of vocational teachers now working under the act; and (9) that the morale of the State and local personnel will be seriously injured.

During the past year States and local communities have experienced serious embarrassment as a result of the reductions in the amount of Federal funds made available below the amounts originally appropriated or authorized by Congress to be appropriated for 1933. They have been further embarrassed by the uncertainty attaching to these appropriations, which has extended up to the beginning and even after the beginning of the fiscal year of the State or local community. Appropriations by the Vocational Education Act of 1917 for allotment to the States for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, were reduced by the Economy Act of June 30, 1932, from $7,157,977.62 to $6,442,179.81, and the appropriation under the George-Reed Act for this same fiscal year was reduced by the Independent Offices Appropriation Act of June 30, 1932, by $500,000 below the amount authorized to be appropriated for this year.

In this connection it must be remembered that all Federal funds for vocational education are matched by State and local money, and the Commissioner has pointed out in his report that during last year the States and local communities expended $2.90 for each dollar of Federal aid for vocational education. This does not include expenditures for plant and equipment of vocational schools, for which no Federal money can be used.

The people throughout the entire country have a great interest in this problem. In the first place, local boards of education have invested considerable sums of money in plant and equipment of vocational schools under the assurance that this Federal aid for vocational education will be continued. Second, all those who are familiar with this type of educational work appreciate its value to the boys and girls it is serving and want it to be continued.

At this point I wish to insert in the RECORD a table showing the enrollment in vocational schools by years and by States.

Enrollment in federally aided schools or classes by years 1918 to 1933, and by States for the year ended June 30, 1933¹

In the district of Ohio that I have the honor to represent, the value of this vocational education work is well recognized. Because of the far-sighted interest of the citizens of Hillsboro, Ohio, the first Smith-Hughes vocational agriculture department in Ohio was established in the Hillsboro High School in 1918. In the same county, at Greenfield, there is—what is considered to be—one of the finest and best equipped vocational departments in the United States.

Through money provided by a distinguished and public-spirited citizen of Greenfield a completely equipped vocational building was erected some years ago. This is a part of the world famous Edward Lee McClain High School, which is one of the finest institutions of learning to be found anywhere.

There are 10 or 12 other vocational agriculture and home economics schools in my district, in each of which an equally high type of educational work is being carried on.

Without going into minute details, I wish to speak briefly with reference to the character of the teaching in the so-called "Smith-Hughes schools."

It so happened when I attended college some years ago at Ohio State University that I enrolled in the teacher-training course in vocational agriculture, and upon my graduation I was granted a certificate to teach vocational agriculture, and while I have never taught this subject, for 8 years I was a teacher and high-school principal in two schools, where vocational agriculture and home economics were taught. Consequently I know something of the character of the educational work in the vocational-education departments of our high schools.

I believe there is no type of teaching of such a high degree of efficiency as that carried on in the vocational departments of our high schools. The teachers are particularly well trained for their work. They are required to be college graduates with a special course of training for this type of work. The vocational teachers are employed for the entire year with 1 month's vacation. Under this plan, they are able to exert valuable influence as community leaders during the time when the public schools are not in session.

The recitation periods in vocational courses are usually 90 minutes in length, which is double the usual high-school recitation period. Because of these long recitation periods it is possible to combine laboratory instruction with the information secured from textbooks, and consequently much more rapid progress is made by the students than under the usual procedure.

In addition, each boy who studies vocational agriculture is required to complete successfully a satisfactory farm project in the subject he is studying before he receives his credit for that subject. For example, if a boy is studying farm crops, he would be required to have set aside for him by his father, or some other farmer, a tract of land varying in size according to the type of crop. On this land the boy, under the supervision of the teacher of vocational agriculture, is required to plan for the growing of the crop, which is to be his home project. The boy must do at least a part of each of the different types of work required on the crop being grown.

On many projects the boys do practically all of this work.

Complete records are kept and a detailed report is made at the end of the year showing the profit or loss on the project. In most cases there is an agreement that the boy shall have for his own any profit derived from his project. In this way there is aroused an additional incentive to do good work. I know of many instances in vocational agriculture where the boys have, through their experience with their home projects, been able to suggest worth-while improvements in the management of their home farms.

In vocational home economics the high-school girls carry out similar home projects in cooking and sewing.

In fact, this vocational-education work is the most practical type of high-school training we have. It serves those boys and girls who will not have the opportunity of going to college and gives them a broad, practical training for their life work.

For the reason that practically all of the vocational agricultural schools and most of the vocational home economic schools are located in village or rural high schools, the funds for which are primarily derived from taxation on farm land, Federal aid for the payment of the salaries of these vocational teachers is absolutely necessary.

The same problem holds true with reference to the trades and industries vocational courses which are in most instances located in industrial centers, which are also in equal need of Federal aid for the payment of the salaries of their vocational teachers.

As I have endeavored to outline in the brief time allotted to me, this is an important and an urgent problem, and I hope this bill will soon be passed in order that this necessary relief may be granted.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN] 10 minutes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, we have just listened to a good Republican campaign speech, the best Republican campaign speech I ever listened to. But the gentleman from Massachusetts did not undertake to explain the real purposes of this bill. He gave us a lot of quotations, and when he was asked about the speech of Mr. Mills at Topeka, he ran away to cover and said that Mills was not an official. I will tell you what Mills said, and he was an orthodox Republican.

Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, I think the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, covered the explanation of this bill, and most thoroughly so. I do not believe in coming upon the floor and making a campaign speech. I believe in discussing legislation. When I make a campaign speech I will go to a hall in my district and talk directly to the people.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the way I do.

Mr. CULLEN. I will talk directly to the people in a hall or from the back of a truck.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the way I do, especially from the back of the trucks.

Mr. CULLEN. This bill should be properly named "a bill for economic recovery." That is what the title of the bill should be. Of course, it has to have a tariff flavor. There is nothing in it about that, but my dear friends on the other side—and they are all friends of mine—are in that state of mind that when you discuss the tariff you are stirring up a hornet's nest. They have gone along in that line so many years that the very minute you begin to discuss the tariff they become alarmed and say, "No, no; you must not go into that."

What does this bill do? Under our present laws Congress fixes the tariff. There is no question about that. The Tariff Commission makes minor adjustments. That means that Congress goes in for trading back and forth among the various sections of the country when they fix the duty on imports.

Now, this adequately explains why the American tariffs have advanced to the present unparalleled level. We know that and you know it. Furthermore, it indicates to a great extent why the American exports have decreased from $488,000,000 in January 1929 to $120,589,000 in January 1933. It is true that in January 1934 it was $172,000,000.

Does it not seem obvious that if we do not buy from other countries we cannot sell to other countries?

If it takes Congress a whole session to change duties on imports, our chances in the world markets against countries whose Executives can change tariff duties over night are very slim, and there are 48 countries in the world where the power is lodged in the executives to change tariff duties over night. That was done here a couple of years ago in Canada. An Order in Council changed the tariff duty over night and raised a barrier against our manufacturing interests here. The gentleman knows that very well, and we are not denying what the President wants. What the President wants is the power to change tariff duties up or down within a range of 50 percent, without asking Congress about it. That is what he is asking for and we are acknowledging that. That is something new. It comes along under the new deal which has been so successfully going along for the past year. Thus he should be able to make trade agreements profitably to both sides. Then, of course, there is the usual cry about the President seeking to usurp the powers of Congress, and yet the average school-boy knows that if we do give him the power we always can take it away. It seems so simple and elementary—and I see my friend SNELL laughing at that.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Always to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says he sees his friend SNELL laughing at that. I am smiling at the gentleman's idea of how easy it would be to take the power away, when I realize how hard it would be to get two thirds vote in this House to override a veto of the President.

Mr. CULLEN. Oh, I do not think so. I might add also that the delegation of such power is nothing new. It has always been customary to grant the President certain powers in the consideration of all tariff bills.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. What if we should not be in session for 6 months? In that event, Congress could not act for 6 months, and during that time the President could do as he pleased.

Mr. CULLEN. Oh, the other 6 months would not be so long to wait when probably he would be doing good for the country generally. Personally, I should like to see the President have such power, or at least long enough to let him go after all of the foreign trade that he thinks he can get. That is what I think about it.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Not just now. It is my sincere conviction that this would help solve our problems and our tariff problem to a very great extent. Then there is this other thought. The President represents the United States as a whole, and in such a capacity is the most influential Chief Executive in the world. What are the people of the country looking for today? They are looking for remedial action in the present world crisis. Hence the reason for having Congress confer upon the President extraordinary powers and authority not today inherent in his great office, and Congress is doing this because Congress believes in him; and I have no patience with that kind of criticism, whether it is too much power to grant the President. Are we a bit afraid to give the President of the United States that power? Not the present President of the United States, if I know anything about it—and I know him and have known him for some time. I worked with him in the State Senate of New York, and I know that power is safe in his hands because he will not act indiscreetly.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Will not the whole matter resolve itself into a question of what his tendencies are with respect to tariff or free trade or a tariff for revenue only? What are his tendencies?

Mr. CULLEN. Oh, I think the gentleman is getting back to the old Democratic principle of tariff for revenue only, and the Republican principle of protection for American industry.

Mr. FOCHT. I am getting back to Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. CULLEN. But that has no bearing whatever on this subject.

Mr. FOCHT. They would never submit a proposition like this.

Mr. CULLEN. No; because this is new, and this is what the people want. They want to be pulled out of the hole they are in, and we have a man in the White House who will do it.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman just told us about the 50-percent flexibility under Mr. Hoover.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes; but he never exercised it.

Mr. FOCHT. I asked the gentleman whether the present President would exercise it, and what are his tendencies anyhow. Is he for a protective tariff or is he one of these tariff-for-revenue-only men?

Mr. CULLEN. The gentleman will find out sooner or later. I refuse to yield any more.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman will find that it resolves itself into that question.

Mr. CULLEN. I refuse to yield. I want to tell something now about a little speech that was delivered in Topeka, Kans. I do not know how this is going to sound, but the story was not really told in the opening of the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. CULLEN. If there was one man more than another that served in this Congress that I had great admiration for, irrespective of political affiliations, it was Mr. Ogden Mills. I consider him a very able citizen and a very energetic one. He was a man who applied himself wonderfully to his work here, just as he did in the legislative body in the State of New York, where I first became acquainted with him, and as I afterward knew him as Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not know of a better Republican in the United States than Ogden Mills. He is as good a Republican with his party and its organization as I am a Democrat with my party and its organization. On his way out to the coast a few months ago he stopped off at Topeka, Kans., and he delivered a speech. I am quoting him now, not from my memory.

Let me quote from a speech delivered by our former distinguished colleague and former Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ogden Mills, during a visit to Topeka, Kans., several months ago:

I prefer to turn my attention to the possibilities, amongst others, of restoring lost markets and the stimulation of increased consumption, not only through the restoration of purchasing power at home but through the promotion of a greater prosperity and a higher standard of living the world over. Granted that the difficulties are enormous and that much time and patience will be required, this is even more true of the self-containment program.

What was the self-containment program? The program you have been operating under for a number of years under our own form of government.

We will have to abandon the present policy of isolation and intense nationalism and, to some extent, modify our recent tariff practices.

What was he sounding then? The Smoot-Hawley law, I take it.

This may sound strange, coming from an orthodox Republican—

And this is the statement, quoting him—

but I have never understood that a sound system of protection based on the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad, if intelligently applied, means the erection of impossible tariff barriers, the destruction of our commerce with the rest of the world, and the sacrifice of the efficient farmer and to save the inefficient manufacturer.

That is Congressman Mills. I have a great deal of respect for him and his judgment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. And that is in contrast with the position taken by the 10 Republican colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means, when practically every one of them admitted in public hearing that they stood for the complete economic isolation of the United States?

Mr. CULLEN. There is no question about it. They voted for it. They went on record for it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell the House what duties his party has lowered since it has been in control of the Government?

Mr. CULLEN. We have only been in power since 1932.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Well, what do you propose?

Mr. CULLEN. We are starting.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What do you propose?

Mr. CULLEN. We will let you know later. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLEN. That is what you are trying to find out, but we will let you know later. You will hear it with compound interest. I refuse to yield further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I have them on the anxious seat, and I want to keep them there.

Of course, other Republicans may oppose the proposed tariff policy, but the President of the United States today has asked Congress to permit him to do what Mr. Mills declared in his Topeka speech would save us from an all-around lowering of the standards of living.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULLEN. Pardon me. Not now. Wait until you hear this one.

Then, again, let us see what Chairman Robert L. O'Brien, of the United States Tariff Commission, has to say in regard to the proposed legislation. Nobody will accuse him of being a Democrat. He is as good a Republican as I know in the country; but what did he say?

When he appeared at the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, he warmly gave his endorsement to the President's recommendation that authority be given the President to change existing duties as much as 50 percent in order to facilitate the negotiation of the reciprocal trade agreements which would help to revive our lost foreign trade. His only criticism about this bill that we are considering now is that the plan as embodied in the bill before Congress does not go far enough.

What do you think of that for a Republican colleague?

In its present form it prohibits the transfer of any articles from the dutiable to the free list and vice versa. Mr. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, would give the President power to do this, and it would enable him to bargain on better terms, for example, with Japan and Brazil, whose principal exports to this country—namely, silk and coffee—are at present on the free list. Mr. O'Brien is going far beyond the bill itself, and expressed his firm belief that we ought to resort to a more sensible base on tariffs.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. O'Brien is former editor of the Boston Herald, the outstanding and strongest Republican organ in New England.

Mr. CULLEN. Oh, there is no question about it. I have known the gentleman for years. He is one of the greatest and biggest Republicans in his party and one of the outstanding men of the country, so far as that goes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. I should like to quote a few lines of Mr. O'Brien's testimony.

Mr. CULLEN. After I have finished in regard to Mr. O'Brien. Perhaps I have here what the gentleman wants.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Will you yield to me then?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield for another observation?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. O'Brien was appointed by President Hoover, and he is also a resident of Massachusetts.

Mr. CULLEN. Of course.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not want to get involved in a discussion with reference to one of my best friends, but in all fairness the gentleman ought to say that Mr. O'Brien today holds his appointment from President Roosevelt.

Mr. CULLEN. Originally received from President Hoover.

Mr. McCORMACK. But my colleague from Massachusetts did not complete the picture.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. He is a hold-over.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he was appointed by President Roosevelt and his first position was under President Hoover.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. The testimony of Mr. O'Brien which I desire to quote is particularly applicable at this point, if the gentleman will yield. I quote from Mr. O'Brien's testimony, page 73, as possibly bearing upon the change of his views. He there testified:

The President appoints the members of the Tariff Commission. Somebody said yesterday there was a bipartisan phase to it, and of course, there is; but any President can pick out men from the opposite party whose views are identical with his own. Next, it may be assumed that any man who is holding a position desires to be reappointed to it; and I say that the present Tariff Commission coming up for reappointment during the term for which President Roosevelt has now been elected, it is clear to me and ought to be clear to everybody that the Tariff Commission method of operating is Presidential tariff-making.

Mr. CULLEN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I can understand why that statement is wanted in the Record at this point; probably his Republicanism is not as orthodox as they think it should be.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULLEN. He also deplored the fact that the world is so broken up by tariff restrictions. The more open trade relations we have, the better. He did not believe that the cost of production should be the basis of tariff-making. Of course, the authors of the Hawley-Smoot law will shudder at this heresy—that is political heresy from that side of the Chamber, although we are getting a few recruits from over there. It is obvious that if tariffs must always be kept high enough to equalize the cost of production between the domestic and the foreign article, an impossible barrier is put in the way of exchange of most goods in international trade.

The high tariff rates of the Hawley-Smoot law has absolutely paralyzed our shipping. Those of us who come from seaport communities and who want to be fair must admit that we have not been exporting or importing to any great extent since the Hawley-Smoot law. They have built a wall against us so high it would take an airplane to get over it. The sharp decline of recent years in export and import trade means a falling off of the varied activities in seaport communities. It is not only a matter of loading and unloading vessels and of trucking, but of business handled by houses engaged in exporting, importing, and wholesaling, and of marine-insurance organizations and many other lines of work.

According to the figures of our experts, our exports have decreased from $480,000,000 down to $120,000,000, speaking in round numbers. I call particular attention to this statement: From January 1929, when our imports reached the total of $4,389,000,000, they have fallen off in January of 1933 to $1,122,000,000, and the total exports of the United States fell from $5,157,000,000 in 1929 to $1,149,000,000 in 1933. Imports fell from $4,389,000,000 in 1929 to $1,122,000,000 in 1933.

Is it any wonder that our shipping, one of the greatest industries of our country, is paralyzed? Is it any wonder our shipping has been driven from the high seas? Why? In my judgment because of tariff walls built up under the Smoot-Hawley system which invited the retaliatory measures that have been taken against us by foreign countries.

This bill should be labeled "A bill to promote better economic conditions in our country and to relieve to a great extent the unemployment situation which is prevailing throughout our country and to restore prosperity." It will help to bring about reciprocal relations with other countries and at the same time protect our industrial and manufacturing interests and the American farmer.

It is not enough to say that it is unacceptable to the minority without saying specifically why not; and in the present instance a purely partisan opposition, unless it take the stand on a principle not yet disclosed, will appear to many as being only a selfish grouping of those sectional interests which through the means of logrolling and backscratching have brought congressional tariff-making into disrepute.

Give to President Roosevelt the power which is asked for in this bill, as I know and am sure he will exercise it for the best interests of our people and of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I have been no little interested in noticing the delight with which some of my Democratic colleagues have rolled the name of Mr. Mills around their tongues when they have referred to certain statements which he made in a speech delivered at Topeka. The Members who have been in this House for a number of years know very well that Mr. Mills does not always speak my language. Further than that, they know that I have never hesitated to agree or disagree with any President or any other official or individual, regardless of what political party the official or individual belonged to. May I say that the program that Mr. Mills subscribed to when he stated he wished at this time to have this country undertake the raising of the standards of living of all the peoples of the world is outside the range of my approval? As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, the first problem confronting the people of this country is to restore the American standard of living to the people of America before we undertake to raise the standard of living of the Chinese coolies on the Yangtze River or similar peoples elsewhere. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss this question from a nonpartisan point of view. I think anyone who has known me long will say that never have they heard me discuss any question on the floor of this House from a partisan standpoint. I am not interested primarily in partisanship here. I am interested in the welfare of the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, in arising to address myself to the issue which now is before us, I find myself stirred to my innermost depths by the grave import for the future hidden in the heart of this measure, which proposes that the Congress of the United States shall further abdicate its functions under a constitutional government, and turn over to a sincere and earnest and honest Chief Executive, who, despite these admirable qualities, which no one doubts, still is not omniscient, one of the greatest and most far-reaching of the legislative powers under the Constitution of the fathers.

We must not forget, Mr. Chairman, that this is permanent legislation we are proposing, and that any power turned over to the present occupant of the White House is also turned over to all those who shall come after him until such time as the act shall be repealed. This undoubtedly would require a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress, as history teaches us that potentates or men of great power relinquish that power only with extreme reluctance.

Therefore, I say, as I address myself in opposition to this measure, I am moved, not by partisan sentiment, not by sectional prejudice, but I am moved by a genuine fear for the future of my people and my country in this proposed further abandonment of constitutional government.

I want it clearly understood at the outset of these remarks, Mr. Chairman, that I am in no sense questioning for one moment the sincerity of purpose of the President of the United States or of his advisers. But, no one, and least of all the President himself, claims omniscience for the Chief Executive. Why, if there has been any one man within the last 12 months of these terrible times through which this country has passed who has insisted and insisted again that he did not know what to do, but frankly was experimenting, it has been Franklin Delano Roosevelt. I admire him for his frankness in telling our people honestly and openly that he is experimenting. But the fact still remains that not only is the President not omniscient, but he, himself, regardless of either his purpose, his wisdom, or his foresight, cannot personally carry out the provisions of this measure, if it is enacted, but must be guided entirely by advisers, none of whom claims omniscience.

One of the witnesses we had before the Ways and Means Committee during the hearings on this bill was the Honorable Robert L. O'Brien, Republican member and Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission. His appearance there was a continuous testimony of the splendid vigor and ability of the man. Unquestionably one of the ablest men in the Government service, he has hundreds of men working under him collecting information upon which to enable the Tariff Commission to base its analyses and decisions. It is his duty to carefully weigh all the facts before arriving at a decision. The duties of his office occupy all his time. There is no place in his busy day for anything other than this. He is now performing the functions which this bill would thrust upon the shoulders of the President of the United States, were he personally to determine what shall be done in connection with the proposed trade agreements.

The office of President is one that carries with it burdensome cares of every kind and character. Not a minute of his time belongs to the President in the performance of duties already resting heavily upon him. To believe that he, if given the authority granted him by this bill, would give his personal attention, or could give his personal attention, to the problems that would be constantly arising is preposterous, is ridiculous, and I do not believe that any man or woman within the sound of my voice believes that he will give his personal attention to these duties.

He must necessarily delegate this duty to others. He, no doubt, will delegate them largely to the members of his Cabinet who appeared before our committee. They are men who apparently believe that our foreign trade can be revived and extended, but, notwithstanding the most diligent examination of these witnesses, they failed to name one single product that could, under the provisions of this bill, be imported into this country without injury to American industry or agriculture. They, Mr. Chairman, are men. They, Mr. Chairman, are earnest men. They, Mr. Chairman, are able men. And yet they are no more earnest nor are they more able, in my opinion, than the Members of this Congress, who represent directly and absolutely the people of this country in expressing the popular will.

Therefore, if and when this Congress should turn this great power vested in this august body under the Constitution over to a group in the Executive department of Government, we have abandoned just that much further the few vestiges of constitutional government that remain to our people. How, Mr. Chairman, can we expect to get any better results if we turn the fate of our industry, of our agriculture, and the fate of every man, woman, and child in this country over to this group of executives, pleasant though it might be to so easily evade the tremendous responsibilities laid upon us under the Constitution as representatives of the people.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is a sweet and pleasant thing to pass responsibility for the prosperity or the ruin of this country over to other hands, but is it the manly, the right, and the statesmanlike thing to do? If this measure is enacted into law and should prove to be unwisely administered, could we as Members of Congress say that the responsibility was not ours? I do not believe we could, because after all, under the Constitution, we here are charged with the solemn responsibility of deciding for the people of the United States who shall exercise the powers necessary for that freedom and prosperity so dearly bought by the blood of our fathers on many a battlefield. This, Mr. Chairman, is what we are considering here—the abandonment, if you please, of one of the greatest bulwarks of our constitutional form of government for the sake of further experimentation in a field which, members of the executive group have within the last 2 weeks informed the Ways and Means Committee of this House, calls for a completely new study without the benefit of any rules or yardsticks.

I now wish to pose some questions which obtrude themselves and cry for answer. The purpose of this bill is to turn over to the President of the United States indefinitely the power to decrease or to increase the tariffs and to lift import restrictions without any further recourse to or advice from the Congress, on the theory that, if we are to sell in foreign markets, we must also buy in foreign markets.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the statistics compiled in the press, in economic studies, including those of the Department of Commerce, the Foreign Policy Association, and numerous other bodies, all show that for a period of 100 years our exports have never averaged more than 7 percent of our total production. There are those who claim that it runs as high as 10 percent, and I am ready to grant even that figure for the sake of argument, but it is an exaggerated figure. But even so, 90 percent of the market for American products lies within the limits of the continental United States.

That market is now off approximately 50 percent from the normal level of consumption. I now ask the Members of this body to consider for a moment what would happen if we were able to sell 10 percent of our products in foreign markets, and did not have to import a dollar's worth of goods from these markets, just exactly what would we do to restore the other 40 percent of vanished purchasing power which confronts us here at home? I mean to say, Mr. Chairman, that even in that event we would still be minus 40 percent of our market at the expense, very largely, of the 90 percent. In other words, if we are going to buy in foreign markets, then we are going to buy those things which are produced in this country (as practically everything we do not raise or manufacture is already on the free list and can be imported from foreign countries without restriction and without limit), and if we buy them in foreign markets, it will have to be in competition with and at the expense of the producers of this country, unless we can find in the various countries of the world so many billions of dollars worth of products and materials which we need, and which are not and cannot be produced in this country; and that, Mr. Chairman, we all know is an impossibility, because foreign producers are now selling here all such products we can possibly consume.

If the President under the terms of this bill is going to lower tariffs, we face in all of its grave import this inescapable question which must be answered before we can conscientiously vote on this measure: Are we going to import manufactures, fabricated goods, machinery, into this country in order to sell fabricated goods and machinery made in this country to other nations? No, that cannot be true, because other nations can and do produce fabricated goods and machinery more cheaply than we can produce them in this country, because our standards of living and labor are higher, and the cost of production is correspondingly greater. It is true that in some instances as yet we do, through mass production, produce, even with high labor costs, machinery in this country, such as automobiles, which may still undersell in the world markets. But, the whole tendency in every country in the world is to buy American labor-saving machinery and to adopt American mass-production methods, and with the lower standards of living and the lower wages, if, as, and when each of these countries acquire the machinery and the technique, of course they can manufacture at lower costs than we; and that will come in the automobile field just as certainly as it has come in the shoe-manufacturing field.

Our manufacturers of machinery and fabricated goods well know that for us to import against their domestic market products such as they make is to rehabilitate foreign trade at the expense of the rehabilitation of domestic industry. It is to aid, as I understand it, our machine industry largely that this bill is proposed. Are we, then, to import from these countries agricultural products in competition with our own already overproduced agricultural products? Is that what we are going to buy from these foreign markets in order to aid the manufacturing industry? If that be true—and that is exactly what this thing means, Mr. Chairman—then it means that this Congress is considering turning over to a few executives surrounding the President the power to determine whose businesses, whose prosperity, and whose means of livelihood shall be ruthlessly stripped from them in order that some other segment of American industry or agriculture and the American people may live in plenty.

This measure means, Mr. Chairman, that we are today considering whether or not we are going to pass a death sentence upon a very great portion of our agricultural industry in this country in order that we may nurture the remainder of industry. This measure means, Mr. Chairman, that we are considering here today whether or not we are going to say to one great class of our people, the farmers: "Here and now we are going to deny you your constitutional rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, because we feel there is not enough life, liberty, and happiness to go around, and we are going to reserve it for the manufacturing interests of this country at your expense." That, Mr. Chairman, is exactly what this measure means.

If it does not mean that, it must mean that we are going to say to the manufacturing industry, "Here and now we are going to deny you your constitutional right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in order to nurture the agricultural industry." If it means neither of these, it must, Mr. Chairman, mean the development of our foreign markets for both agriculture and industry at the expense and the sacrifice and the destruction of every element of either agriculture or manufacturing that may, in the opinion of those surrounding the President of the United States, be deemed "inefficient" industries.

Where is the evidence of this last assumption? It is in the policy already laid down before the committees of this House in relation to the sugar allotments and the statements of those close to the President who have appeared and supposedly expressed the administration's position on legislation pending in this House.

It seems obvious to me that this proposition presents two horns of a dilemma, one of which we cannot possibly avoid if we are to enact this bill. If we are going to export manufactures and import agricultural products, we are going to nurture manufactures over the corpse of American agriculture. Conversely, if we are going to import manufactures in order to export agricultural products, we are going to nurture agriculture upon the corpse of the manufacturing industry. The two propositions are so utterly incompatible, namely, that we can export both manufactured and agricultural products and not import either of them, that it is perfectly futile, in my opinion, to even consider the matter, inasmuch as every man and woman within the sound of my voice knows that it is wholly impossible for us to purchase from all these other countries enough billions of dollars' worth of raw materials or products now on the free list and not produced in this country to "create a fair and just balance of trade as between this and other nations." And this is not to mention the fact that we cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, expect any foreign nation to compel its peoples to buy our goods in the foreign markets at a price which must be vastly greater than the price at which the same character of goods could be purchased by the peoples of those nations from foreign producers.

Imagine for a moment, Mr. Chairman, how this country would react to a proposal on the part of the President for this Congress to vest him with the power to decree that Americans must buy foreign machinery, or foreign-made clothing, or foreign-made shoes, or foreign-grown wheat and cotton at prices twice what they could be produced and sold for at home. Why, he would be considered to have gone mad to propose any such thing; and yet this is precisely what we are expecting him under this bill to propose to foreign peoples.

This is exactly what the President will have to do if he is to make this plan effective, in the event this bill is passed, unless always he is prepared to crucify, to destroy many of the fine industrial and agricultural activities of this country that have been supplying the people of the United States with necessary employment and products down through the years, but which today in the opinion of some of his advisers are considered inefficient.

There is one phase, one inevitable effect of this proposal that, in my opinion, has escaped the attention very largely of everybody who has been discussing it, and that is that just as surely as we open our doors to the products of pauper foreign labor, we will start to bring the American standard of living down to the levels of the European and oriental standards of living. Just as surely we will start the price levels downward, instead of upward, because it is inevitable that if we are to reduce production costs in this country in order to invade foreign markets in competition with foreign products, we are going to have to do it by the only method known, namely, a reduction of American wages and American living standards, or the vastly increased use of technological appliances which will mean a further displacement of labor. If we do that, the American people are going then to have to buy where they can buy the cheapest, and that means the destruction of price levels in spite of all Mr. Roosevelt and his advisers possibly could do.

It is not production that stabilizes price levels; it is demand that establishes and stabilizes price levels. It is purchasing power that maintains price levels and not producing power. I defy any man or woman in this House to challenge my statement when I say that if we do not have consuming power in America there will be no industry, because there would be no consuming power to justify such industry.

Consuming power is people plus purchasing power, and purchasing power in the United States of America spells wages—high wages.

Again I reiterate, Mr. Chairman, that the minute we open our doors to cheap foreign products and put our workers into competition with foreign labor, just that minute we start the American wage level on the toboggan that leads to a bottomless abyss of utter ruin and chaos. The minute we start American wage levels on the toboggan downward, that minute we start price levels on the toboggan downward because it is consuming power that determines price levels.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the President is today insisting upon shorter hours and higher wages in industry in order to increase purchasing power, which is one of the two essential factors of consuming power. How we can hope to shorten hours, raise wages, increase production costs, and then force our products into foreign markets, where long hours and low wages mean low production costs, is so utterly beyond my mental concept of economics that I find myself wholly incapable of following such a line of reasoning.

Perhaps someone may question this. It has been said in testimony before the Ways and Means Committee by none other than the Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull—for whom I have the most profound respect and admiration, and whose sincerity and integrity no man may question—that the information and the studies which repose in the State Department have not yet been sufficiently classified and studied to throw any light on or to provide any answer to the questions I have just propounded to this House, and that this entire act is to be based upon some study which it is hoped may indicate some experimental avenue of approach to the reopening of foreign trade.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the President does not intend to lower the bars which today protect American manufacturers from the onslaughts of cheap foreign manufactures, and if the President does not mean to lower the bars which protect the American farmers against the wool and the oils and the hides and the cotton and the dairy products and the wheat and other agricultural commodities raised by the pauper labor of other countries, then I ask the Members of this House where does he intend to find these things which we may buy in sufficient quantities from the other countries to enable them to spend in our markets these billions they talk about?

If the President is unable to find a sufficient number of products produced in other countries which are not produced here, then it is to be assumed that this act will be inoperative, in which case, Mr. Chairman, this Congress will have abdicated one of its most solemn and important functions under the Constitution—we will have taken another long stride toward bureaucracy and the abandonment of our democratic form of government for no purpose whatsoever, and that is something which ought not to be even thought of by this august body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see for a moment what we may expect to buy under the operation of this bill if we expect to sell. The items which I am now going to quote are taken from the reports of the United States Department of Commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Commerce Yearbook of 1930, and other publications of the Department of Commerce as compiled in volume 6, no. 16, of the Foreign Policy Association's information service.

Take the year 1929 as the last year in which imports were at their peak, and I want to call to the attention of this House the fact that the leading imports from Canada for that year were lumber, wood pulp, nickel, wheat, pulpwood, cattle, and furs, undressed. Most assuredly lumber, wheat, and cattle, to say nothing of furs, were in competition with domestic industry. It is to be assumed then that if we are to do more business with Canada we will have to buy in Canada more lumber, more wheat, more cattle, and more undressed furs, among the other items which include standard newsprint, wood pulp, pulpwood, and nickel.

In the same year from Cuba we imported sugar, tobacco, molasses, cigars, iron ore, and pineapples; and of that list sugar, tobacco, molasses, cigars, and pineapples came into this country in competition with domestic agriculture and industry, to say nothing of iron ore. Presumably then, if this act goes into effect, we are going to have to buy more sugar, more tobacco, more molasses, more cigars, more iron ore, and more pineapples from Cuba.

From Mexico in the same year we bought copper, sisal and henequen, crude petroleum, lead, coffee, cattle, chicle, cotton, bananas, chickpeas, and tomatoes. Of these imports, copper, petroleum, lead, cattle, cotton, chickpeas, and tomatoes were in competition with domestic agriculture and industry; and yet presumably under this bill we will have to buy more of these items from Mexico, if we expect to sell her people industrial machinery, automobiles and parts, iron and steel products, electrical machinery, and so forth.

In the same year, Mr. Chairman, we imported from Argentina, flaxseed, cattle hides, meats, wool, furs, sheepskins, and casein, every item of which was in competition with domestic agricultural production.

In the same year from Uruguay we imported wool, meats, hides, and sheepskins, every item of which was in competition with American agriculture.

From Spain we imported olives, almonds, edible oils, goat and sheep skins, every item of which was in competition with our domestic production.

We imported from France undressed furs, gloves, silk wearing apparel and fabrics, cotton laces, rayon manufactures, and walnuts, which were in competition with domestic industry.

From Italy in the same year we imported edible oils, cheese, tomatoes, hats, wool felt, tobacco, cherries, and almonds, all of which were in competition with domestic production.

From Switzerland we imported cheese, materials for hats, and cotton cloth in competition with domestic industry.

From Australia we imported wool, undressed furs, sausage casings, sheepskins, and cattle hides, all of which were in competition with domestic industry.

From New Zealand, we imported hides and skins, wool, sausage casings, all of which items were in competition with domestic industry.

I could continue to recite similar items which would come in in ever-increasing quantities from every other country in this world, if we buy from them as contemplated under this act, all of which would come in direct competition with American production.

Mr. Chairman, there is a very singular fact in connection with this whole question, and it is that almost 90 percent of all the items imported from these countries are items in competition with agriculture, while the leading exports from the United States to every one of these countries was, first, automobiles; second, iron and steel-mill products; and, third, electrical machinery.

If it is established, Mr. Chairman, and it is established, that we cannot possibly use enough products from other countries which we do not or cannot produce in this country, to maintain a proper economic balance of trade with those countries, then we will have to buy, if this act is to be operative, from those other countries, products which are produced in this country.

In that case, if we are to nurture the manufacturing industry at the expense of agriculture, the manufacturer is going to have to give up a part of his domestic market here at home in exchange for foreign markets abroad.

If we are going to nurture agriculture at the expense of the manufacturing industry, the agriculturalist is going to have to give up a part of his market here at home for a market abroad.

Let us see if this is true. From 1920 to as late as 1932 not only was American capital being expatriated and put into foreign manufactures to serve foreign markets but American industry was establishing foreign branch factories. Now, why? Because, our Democratic friends maintain, of high American tariff walls, which, in their opinion, made it impossible to carry on this international trade. They are not correct. It was because the American industrialist found that he could produce for his foreign market at a cheaper cost by using cheap foreign labor and cheap foreign materials in the countries in which they exist, by avoiding the long haul with its consequent costs of carriage, and by avoiding frozen capital invested in transit and insurance charges in transit, and thereby could meet foreign competition on its own ground. This is exactly the reason behind the phenomenal flight of manufactures to foreign countries. It was not because of the American tariff walls, although it is true that foreign tariff walls set up further obstacles; but if there was not a vestige of tariff existing either here or elsewhere, if the whole world were today on a basis of free trade, the American industrialist, if he would serve his foreign markets at a price which could compete with producers in those foreign markets, would be compelled to maintain foreign branch factories. That fact is so apparent that, I think, no intelligent person would for a moment assume to contradict it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Why is it that American branch factories were not established in foreign countries in previous years and that the practice began only recently?

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I say that I am surprised at the question, because ordinarily the gentleman from Washington is well informed on these matters?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I should like to have the information.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 18 additional minutes to the gentleman and trust he will complete his statement in that time.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Again I say to the gentleman from Washington that usually he is well informed. I call his attention to Senate Document No. 120, which has been printed within the last 3 weeks. This document will tell the gentleman that for many years there has been an ever-constant flight of capital abroad for investment in branch factories.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman from Michigan will admit, I am sure, that within the last 3 or 4 years these branch factories have increased to a very large extent?

Mr. WOODRUFF. No; quite the reverse. In order to satisfy the gentleman from Washington I will at this point print a report of the Department of Commerce in connection with this very thing, and the gentleman can satisfy himself as to whether or not he is correct in his statement. I was just going to discuss this Senate document.

This is Senate Document 120, recently issued, which is a report from the Department of Commerce in response to Senate Resolution 138 of the Seventy-second Congress, on American branch factories abroad, together with an analysis of returns from United States producers with investments of $50,000 or more in foreign plants in 1932. This shows that a total of approximately $2,177,693,244 was at that time invested by American industry in foreign branch plants. The number of plants approximated 1,800. And keep in mind, ladies and gentlemen, that this list is wholly incomplete, because, in the first place, it embraces only plants in which more than $50,000 per plant is invested, and, secondly, it does not include any plants or activities established and maintained by American capital which operates no American plant; and, third, it does not include many plants concerning which some American firms refused to report. And further it does not include those American investments and activities in foreign countries which do not provide competition for American production.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Then it does not give very much information on the subject about which I inquired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. It gives the information which I said I would give the gentleman, and when the gentleman sees the different years in which these plants have been established abroad, I am sure the information will be helpful to him.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We want a comparative figure. As I understand the gentleman, his figures were for 1932.

Mr. WOODRUFF. They were figures for all time up to 1932. The table gives the establishment of the branch factories abroad by years.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Together with the total amount of capital involved?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Then the gentleman's figures are not comparable.

Mr. WOODRUFF. May I say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is limiting my time and I have much to say. I believe I will anticipate most of the gentleman's questions if he will permit me to proceed uninterrupted. I will put the report in the RECORD and let the report speak for itself.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It may not speak correctly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Then that is the fault of the report and not the fault of the gentleman from Michigan.

This is the whole and complete answer to the charge that American tariff walls are responsible for the flight of American capital and American plants into foreign countries. This is the absolute evidence that American producers cannot produce in America and ship abroad as cheaply as producers can produce and serve their markets at home in foreign countries. This will be doubly true now that we are supplying our foreign competitors with the most up-to-date mass-production machinery. It must be equally true that we cannot hope to compete in these foreign markets for American-made goods unless we reduce the cost of production to a point where we not only can compete with lower foreign wages, cheaper foreign materials, but also be able to absorb cost of carriage, insurance in transit, and interest on frozen capital in transit.

It must be patent to every thinking person that these facts and figures prove that this act cannot be effective except at the expense of the American workingman and the American farmer, and the American standard of living.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one salient fact of the most sinister import hidden here which I am going to drag out to the light of day. The facts I have just quoted from this Senate document show that the manufacturing industry can and does, when deemed necessary, jump across the oceans and establish branch factories in the markets abroad which it wishes to serve. But, mark you well this fact—the American farmer cannot do that thing. His base of operations is irrevocably and irremovably fixed in the soil of this country. He cannot at will move a portion of his "factory"—the farm—to Canada, or to Argentina, or to Brazil, or to England, or to Germany, or to Poland, or to any other country. He is destined by the very nature of his calling to remain fixed, and yet we are here seriously considering sacrificing his interests, taking advantage of his helplessness, crucifying him under some theory that we are going to benefit America by so doing.

If we have come to the time in this country, Mr. Chairman, when this Congress will acquiesce in condemning and executing an industry, which provides a livelihood and the welfare of by far the largest single class of our citizens, in order that other groups shall continue in opulence, then God knows we certainly have abandoned the constitutional form of government and are going into feudalism with a speed that is appalling.

It has been argued time and time again that the reason for our decrease in imports has been the high-tariff barriers, and yet my study of the reports covering exports and imports for the years 1922 to 1932, inclusive, show this significant fact, that of all the imports into this country during the years 1930, 1931, and 1932, the years when the purchasing power of our people was declining with heretofore unknown rapidity, 67 percent of imports remained on the free list. That portion of the import totals shrunk exactly in ratio with the portion which covered items which were dutiable. That means just one thing, namely, that it was not the tariffs but the loss of American purchasing power that caused the reduction in imports.

I will insert that table at this point in my remarks.

Imports for consumption

What items, Mr. Chairman, are going to be affected, if this bill is enacted? It cannot affect the items on the free list. The President cannot reduce the tariff on those, neither can he take those items from the free list. Therefore, he can only reduce the tariff, if this act is enforced at all, on those items, which must be in competition with American products, otherwise they would not have had a tariff imposed upon them in the first place.

But, there is a more important consideration, Mr. Chairman, that I wish to inject at this point. I seriously question, in fact, I do not believe that the automobile manufacturers, the steel manufacturers, the electrical machinery manufacturers, or that any other manufacturers want the agricultural industry of this country penalized in order that they may get some increased foreign trade, because it is inevitable and absolute that every dollar's worth of imports that are brought into this country at the expense of American agricultural products, will mean just that many fewer American farmers' dollars which will go into automobiles and other machinery.

I could not be convinced that the American manufacturer is so blind and stupid as to believe that he can penalize 90 percent of his market to some degree in order to gain some part of 10 percent of a foreign market and still hope to sell the full volume that he previously sold to the 90 percent of his market. The thing just does not make sense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as we look at these different problems which confront us in connection with this measure, it becomes to me perfectly apparent that this is merely another experiment and that the President of the United States and his advisers have no idea what they are going to do with or under this measure if it is enacted. They simply want more power to dicker—to do something that the opportunity may seem to offer in the hope that something will happen—and it is precisely for that reason that I am opposed to this measure, because I am afraid, in the light of the results of past years of American dickering with foreign traders, that something will happen under this act and that that something will be a most unpleasant thing for the American people.

I have in mind the most recent accomplishment along this line, namely, an agreement with France for the importation of $10,000,000 worth of wines and liquors in return for France's permitting the importation of $1,000,000 worth of American apples and pears. Mr. Chairman, almost before the ink was dry on the agreement the French wines and liquors were on their way to the United States. And before those French wines and liquors had landed at American ports the French Government had moved to nullify absolutely the beneficial effects, so far as American apples and pears were concerned, and the net result of the whole deal was that we bought and paid for the liquors and wines, and the American apples and pears lay on the French docks and rotted, almost a total loss to the shippers.

Mr. Chairman, the recent proposal to reduce American beet-sugar production in this country by 300,000 tons, with the attendant loss to the farmers, the workers, and others which this reduction entails, and to turn this tonnage over to our Cuban competitors bears all the earmarks of another of the Utopian trade and other agreements with foreign nations for which this country is famous.

It was said by one very prominent member of the administration before the Ways and Means Committee that the administration hoped under this measure by reducing tariffs to set an example to other nations. God save the mark! Why, Mr. Chairman, as I recall the Treaty of Versailles, after we had sent our men and our money to the battlefields of France, and then asked for nothing, and refused to accept anything except the honor and glory of having made "the world safe for democracy" in order to set an example to a selfish world, I marvel that any man could even consider for a moment trying to set an example to a greedy and grasping group of nations. Why, Mr. Chairman, when I hark back to the Disarmament Treaty of 1922 and think of the ships we sank while the other nations, profiting by our splendid "example", merely tore up blueprints, I marvel that any sane man could for a moment imagine that any example we set to other nations will be regarded as anything except another invitation to rob us and to despoil us of what we have.

When I think of the billions that we have sent across the seas because we wanted, by our example of the "good neighbor", to help those starving children and those war-weary men and women, and when I think of the insolence with which those countries have since said to us, "We will not repay", I marvel that any man could for a moment consider jeopardizing our great agricultural or any other industry in the hope of setting an example to peoples moved by motives such as theirs.

When I think, Mr. Chairman, of the nineteen and one half billions of dollars sent to the countries of the world privately to help them build up their own self-containment, to help them equip their own factories, to help them modernize their agricultural and industrial methods in order that they might buy less instead of more from us; when I think of those defaulted bonds, the defaulted interest, the ultimate loss, if you please, Mr. Chairman, of that treasure, running into the colossal sum of approximately thirty billions, I marvel that any man would have the temerity to say that we hope by "our example" to lead the other nations back to unselfishness and fairness in trade.

Mr. Chairman, I tried in the sessions of the Ways and Means Committee, by every line of questioning that I could think of, to get the proponents of this measure to state to the committee what they expected to buy in those foreign markets, and all I could get was glittering generalities, platitudes, and evasion, and I defy any Member of this House to rise in his place and say that he has read the record and found in the testimony before that committee any answer to the questions I have propounded in these remarks. There was not one single individual representing the administration who was willing frankly to say what they expected to import from those countries I have mentioned; and the only thing that we could get out of them was that it meant bigger markets for American products, provided we would give the foreign producers bigger markets in America for their products.

Fundamentally and philosophically, Mr. Chairman, we are here and now face to face with the irreconcilable theories of the two great schools of thought of this country which have arisen from this terrible crisis through which we have been passing for nearly 4 years—nationalism versus internationalism. The nationalists believe that because 90 to 93 percent of the market for American products lies within the territorial confines of the United States, and because for the last 15 years we have been lending billions of dollars to our foreign purchasers with which to purchase our goods, that our first and most profitable avenue out of this depression is to cease lending money to foreign peoples with which to buy our goods, to increase the purchasing power in the United States, and to let foreign trade take care of itself for the time being.

The other school of thought, which I grant is just as sincere, although I believe utterly mistaken, is the internationalistic philosophy that our welfare, our peace, our safety, and our prosperity are so integrated with the peace, the safety, and the prosperity of every other country in the world that we no longer can disentangle ourselves, and that we must all be on a common level. I warn this Congress that if we do try to meet the other countries of the world on a common level, that level will be a level of honesty, a level of integrity, a level of wages, a level of living standards, far below that which we have enjoyed for the last 40 years in the United States of America. It is utterly impossible for the people of this country to raise the hordes of China, the myriads of India, the multitudes of Asia, and the millions in South and Central America to the American living standard if we give them part of our market. The only conceivable future we can hope to face under the internationalistic theory is a reduction of American living standards to the level of that of the pauper-ridden countries of the Old World and the Far East.

I believe just as sincerely in the philosophy of the "good neighbor" as does Franklin Delano Roosevelt. But I do not believe that it is in any sense a sound philosophy that, to be a good neighbor, I must reduce myself to the moral or the economic level of a neighbor merely because his standards are lower than mine. That may be a very neighborly act for me to do to him, but it is an exceedingly unneighborly act for me to do to mine.

As I cast back over the last 2 decades and realize the awful sacrifices this country has made in blood and treasure to try to help the rest of the world, and as I ponder a Europe today nearer to the verge of war than it was in 1914, and as I ponder those lost billions and those lost boys I question whether or not the moral force of the great American people is sufficient to shed the light into the dark places from whence sprung those motives that today threaten the civilization of the world.

I am not ready, Mr. Chairman, to sacrifice the opportunities, the independence, and the welfare of the farmers and workers of this country any further in the vain hope that I may benefit some Chinese coolie in the Yangtse Valley or some ragged untouchable in India. Charity, Mr. Chairman, begins at home.

With the millions of unemployed, with our papers filled every day with stories of suffering and disaster, with the administration itself trying so frantically to provide employment for our millions who are today homeless and hungry, I cannot find myself ready to engage in any further internationalism, at least until after our own have been clothed and fed and sheltered.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, there is very much more underlying this question upon which we today are making decisions than a mere matter of trade. If we enact this measure, this Congress will have abdicated its power to protect the American people against a surrender of our American standards of living and working.

We will have surrendered to that philosophy of internationalism which I have just outlined. We will have surrendered the peace and the prosperity and the very livelihood of millions of our citizens to the jeopardy of competition with the peasantry of Europe and the coolie labor of the Far East. If we are not doing that, then this act does not mean a single thing.

Mr. Chairman, in a day which now seems long ago, as I sat in the glamorous and dusty atmosphere of the circus, I was wont to marvel at the agility of the equestrian who was able to stand with one foot on the dappled grey and the other on a prancing bay and ride about the ring at a merry gallop, all the while maintaining a perfect equilibrium. As I marvelled at those feats, sometimes I would see even the most practiced equestrian lose his footing because the horses lost the rhythm of the gallop. I fear me much that what we are attempting to do here is something that not even the most expert equestrian ever would have dreamed of trying.

We have mounted with one foot the N.R.A., and under its terms are as rapidly as possible, in fact more rapidly than possible, attempting to increase the cost of all industrial products in this country; and we are considering in this bill putting our other foot upon the steed which is to lead us throughout the reaches of the world in search of markets, in which are now produced more cheaply than we can produce the products which we want to sell them. I fear if this bill is enacted we will find ourselves in the position of the N.R.A. horse going in the direction of higher production costs, and our trade agreement horse running in the exact opposite direction, and I leave it to the imagination of the Members of this body as to what is to happen in such a situation.

While I have put this in a somewhat facetious vein, it remains, nevertheless, a serious and dangerous fact that it will inevitably raise the cost of production if the President's policy of increasing wages and shortening hours is made effective, which it must be, if men are to have jobs at American wages in this country. The cost of production under the N.R.A. has already been increased; and if we attempt then to invade markets in countries which heretofore we could not get into because they could produce more cheaply than we could, it would require a feat of mental gymnastics to find an optimistic view of any such procedure that I find myself wholly incapable of performing.

Mr. Chairman, this whole thing just does not make sense; there are too many contradictions, too many direct opposites involved here for this thing to succeed.

I have presented problems here today to this House that have been agitating my mind, not because I want to find fault with the President or with the President's policies, but because I am sincerely and gravely concerned for the welfare of my country, and because I realize that Mr. Roosevelt has undertaken a task that requires almost superhuman strength and wisdom to perform. I am anxious that he make no mistake, because we have so utterly reposed in him the whole destiny of this great Nation and its people that a mistake on his part will be truly a tragic thing. Therefore, in opposing this, and the administration's proposal with respect to sugar, I do it because I sincerely want to bring, not only to his attention, but to the attention of his advisers, and to the people, the danger inherent here of a mistake which may wreck the future of the United States of America.

This is not something, Mr. Chairman, which may be undone in a day, once it is done. It is not something that can be done by Presidential order and then abandoned in 24 hours if it is found to be a mistaken policy. We are considering here giving the President power to negotiate treaties with other governments; and it is fairly to be presumed that the other governments will demand some notice, some consideration, if you please, before these treaties may be swept aside. Therefore, once the treaties are negotiated, regardless of their dire effect upon our people, or some of our people, the effects will have to be endured for a time, at least.

I was much impressed, Mr. Chairman, in listening to the address of the President to the assembled code authorities under the N.R.A. when he made it so clear that the thing he most wants, the thing he most needs, is constructive criticism. He does not want people to agree with him merely for the sake of agreeing with him. He wants people to disagree with him if they sincerely believe he is making a mistake; and I am convinced that in this case he is making a mistake, and the plan that I propose in lieu of this is to devote our every effort to the restoration of the purchasing power of the people within the continental limits of the United States and, after that has been accomplished, then deal as may seem wise with the question of expansion of exports at the expense of our domestic agriculture and industry.

Mr. Chairman, when we pause to consider that approximately 50 percent of our domestic consumption is paralyzed, and has been in that state for the past 2 or 3 years; and when we consider that at best the most we can hope for from our foreign trade would be a market of perhaps 5 to 6 percent of our production, it seems incredible that anyone could consider trying to develop the 5 or 6 percent until the 40 or 50 percent had first been developed. Mr. Chairman, the 40 or 50 percent of the domestic market that remains to be restored is five times greater than the total combined export trade of the world that we could hope in our rosiest dreams to achieve at any time in the future.

It is not even suggested by the most ardent proponents of this bill that we can hope to recapture the whole of our foreign trade of former years. It is fair to say, I think, that if the average of our foreign trade was 10 percent of our products, that if we could get half of that back we would be doing well, in view of the fact that the purchasing power of the peoples of every country in the world has been steadily reduced along with that of the people of these United States. That would amount to approximately 5 percent of our total production. Suppose we get it back, does anybody for a moment believe that that would operate to restore in some magic manner the loss of the 50 percent of the domestic market and the reemployment of the millions who are now idle in this country? Of course not!

O Mr. Chairman, I could introduce figures and statistics here without end; I could prove my case many times over by reports from the Department of Commerce alone. I could go back through the tomes of testimony in the various hearings before both Houses of this Congress and I could prove my contention over and over again, and it all would mean nothing, because the fundamental problem involved here is the abandonment of our whole economic policy, under which this country has waxed great, and under which it would have continued to wax great if we had not permitted ourselves to become embroiled in that last awful war.

Involved here, Mr. Chairman, is the fundamental question of whether or not we are for all time to abandon almost the last vestige of constitutional government, and to desert the popular representative form of government under our Constitution; and secondly, whether we are to expose our farmers and our workers to competition of foreign farmers and workers and their lower standards of living; or whether we are to remain a self-contained nation, protected on three sides by thousands of miles of salt water; and it is those fundamental problems which are being decided in the adoption or the rejection of this bill.

How I wish I might find words to impress more strongly upon my colleagues what the Congress is contemplating doing here; how far-reaching the effects will be; what terrible mistakes may be wrought under this bill if it is passed; what utter misery may follow the maladministration or the mistaken administration of this act; what serious consequences may follow the misjudgment of some executive, and I do not mean by that the President, because, after all, it will not be the President's judgment which will be reflected in the decisions rendered. Why, Mr. Chairman, one might talk for hours and not complete the categories of the dire possibilities which may flow from the act of this Congress in regard to this bill.

Let us not do this thing, Mr. Chairman, because of which we shall see the setting suns of coming days fall aslant upon fallow fields where there should be the waving grain. Let us not do this thing which shall see desolation hovering over the factories where there should be the hum of happy human activities. Let us not do this thing which inevitably must condemn some portion of our population to idleness and to misery in order that some portions of foreign peoples may have plenty. Let us not embark upon this uncharted course in the stormy and dangerous seas of world trade and world entanglement at a time when our ship of state is threatening the perilous shoals of domestic unemployment. Let us retain unto ourselves this market of ours until such time as our own peoples are again restored to that income which means faith, security, food, shelter, clothing, peace before we attempt an experiment which at best can yield but little to the whole of our needs. Let us remain self-contained; let us first consider our own; let us first restore our domestic markets; let us first reemploy our own citizens. And when that has been accomplished, Mr. Chairman, then, and then only, will the time have arrived when we may conscientiously and consistently, and with safety, cast our eyes again toward greater markets across the seas. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge referred to it as an act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. The ranking minority member of the committee referred to it as an act for the destruction of American industries. I am willing to make the prediction, Mr. Chairman, that in less than 6 months after its enactment it will commonly be referred to as a "trading-with-the-enemy act", and I truly believe this because of my knowledge of the people with whom we are going to deal on these agreements, which I know will become effective after this bill is enacted into law.

We in America have a different psychology concerning agreements from any other nation on earth, and particularly the European nations with whom we have made many agreements.

I do not believe that France, or England, or Belgium, or any of the other European nations, with one or two exceptions, who today owe us $12,500,000,000 will live up to their so-called "trade agreements" any more quickly than they have lived up to their financial agreements with us.

A treaty or a trade agreement with France is nothing more than a scrap of paper. France will adhere to such an agreement if it is to her distinct benefit to do so, and if it is not, she will not. The same thing applies to England. They have repeatedly deliberately violated their agreements with us.

I happened to have been in Paris when the Paris Pact or the so-called "Kellogg Pact" was agreed upon. Why, the ink was not dry on that paper when England and France were deliberately and secretly conspiring to destroy our cruiser program. The very day that the Paris Pact was signed, they were in secret meeting to destroy our cruiser agreements.

Their trade agreements will be no more sacred than their financial treaties with us and should not be taken more seriously than the Japanese promises in China. They mean nothing to those people.

When France came over here and begged us for money and begged us for men we did not ask for a reciprocal treaty of some kind. We asked for no reciprocity. The Wilson administration at that time was convinced that the future democracy of the world was at stake and this took us into the World War, which was fought in vain. We did not suggest to France prior to going into the war that we wanted some reciprocity.

Mr. Chairman, granting to the President single-handed authority to bicker and trade independently and secretly with Old World nations will do more to provoke foreign entanglements than could any other act of the Federal Government.

The sound American tradition of treating all nations alike will be knocked into a cocked hat and the President, without the approval of the Senate, will make different agreements with various countries upon the same commodities which in turn will bring about international complications and prejudices, which may require many, many years of soothing diplomacy to overcome.

It should not be necessary for the United States to bicker with France or England for the exchange of raw or manufactured commodities to the disadvantage of our own industries when those countries already owe us billions of dollars under solemn agreements they have deliberately violated. To willfully destroy our protective tariff walls so as to permit the sale of foreign-made goods in the United States under the subterfuge that these sales will provide money with which the foreigner will in turn purchase American-made goods is a fallacy of simple-minded trust in an unworthy direction.

If it is necessary for us to destroy our own industries in order to provide a trade agreement with France or England, then we had better confine our trade relations to the Western Hemisphere, under subsidies or tariff exemptions if need be.

Great Britain has repeatedly shown her disregard of treaties with us and the solemn promise of France has been shown to be as worthless as the Chinese promises of Japan.

To allow the present weak Department of State to negotiate independently with dozens of foreign governments for the interchange of commerce might prove so disastrous to some of America's industries that it could easily promote a folly in comparison with which the recent unfortunate cancellation of air-mail contracts would fade into obscurity. If President Roosevelt wishes to personally negotiate trade agreements with foreign powers, he already possesses all of the trump cards that are necessary for a game of this kind. Europe today owes the United States twelve and a half billion dollars upon which the Old World nations even refuse to pay us interest. We assisted a number of them to set themselves up as republics after the World War and in addition loaned them hundreds of millions of dollars in our simple feelings for their success. We undoubtedly preserved their very existence. In the case of France, we saved her from a most ignominious defeat and a slaughter of her humans which would have been unparalleled in the history of wars, and yet with a store of much more gold per capita than we ourselves have she refuses to pay even the interest on a debt of honor to us.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of all this, I cannot understand why our Government should place any credence in an agreement made at this time with a slacking, cheating, miserly, and unworthy nation like France. If she had shown the slightest disposition to meet her honorable agreements with us in the past, there might be some reason for having a little confidence in further treaties; but under the circumstances, France has shown herself to be a dishonorable, untrustworthy nation; and to think that she will now change is but placing childish confidence in the world's greatest racketeer.

The Roosevelt administration has now been in office more than a year, and I am sorry to say that it has shown little disposition to force the payment of at least the interest by our European debtors. Surely some way might be found to bring the interest payments up to date, if not the principal payments, now long past due. We should not be compelled by agreement to destroy American industries merely to be permitted to do business with European nations whose very existence we at one time held in the palms of our hands. They were on their knees then, begging for life. We should not be crawling on our knees to them now, begging for business. If they persist in going in their dishonorable paths, I, for one, am ready and willing to let them go. We can get along without them.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman additional time.

Mr. BRITTEN. You gentlemen realize I am not making a partisan speech, and I am not talking politics. I am trying to give you my viewpoint as I see Europe, having been over there 20 times and having lived there for months at a time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. In view of the initial statement of the gentleman that the bill should be labeled a "trading with the enemy act", and that France and England and the other countries will not live up to any of their agreements, and his statement that they violate all agreements and treaties—

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not say they violate all of them.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was my understanding.

Mr. BRITTEN. I said that any treaty or agreement which we made with France that did not redound to her benefit she would violate, and I know she will.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did not the gentleman say that the ink was not dry on some treaty before it was violated?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. I said the ink was not dry on the Paris Pact when France and England were in secret collusion to destroy our cruiser program.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I did not rise to debate that with the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; and I yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. In view of the gentleman's statement, may I ask whether he would favor the withdrawal of our ambassadors and the severing of all diplomatic relations with these countries which the gentleman says we cannot rely upon with respect to anything they may agree to?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; certainly not.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have not any time to yield the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then I cannot yield.

Mr. Chairman, defaulting nations of Europe as of January 4, 1934, are indebted to the United States in the amount of $12,352,498,355.47.

In this amount is included $304,155,582.43 in principal, interest, and moratorium agreements, in which they are in complete default.

Austria, Belgium, Estonia, France, Hungary, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Germany have not paid interest and principal amounts under moratorium and pending agreements in amounts equaling $108,559,354.14.

Czechoslovakia, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, and Rumania have made unimportant token payments on moratorium and pending agreements, but they still are in default in the amount of $195,596,228.29.

Mr. Chairman, when the European war debts were refunded it was agreed that the United States would accept Treasury notes of large denominations from the debtor countries.

For the benefit of the debtor and creditor alike, the funding agreements provided that upon notice from the United States these large Treasury notes or bonds would be exchanged for bonds of small denominations in detail and as requested by the Secretary of the United States Treasury. These bonds were to be paid in gold, and in the case of France it is specifically provided that she will assist us in marketing her small bonds in the marts of Paris.

It is, of course, understood that the small bonds so presented to the United States will be of maturity dates in conformance with the requirements of the funding agreement, thus falling due in small amounts annually.

If the United States Secretary of the Treasury had taken advantage of our right for small-denomination bonds directly after 1926 when the refunding agreements were signed, we undoubtedly would have sold those bonds in the world markets outside of the United States during the boom year, and the practice, once started, would have been continued, and today practically every European country would not be in default and the $304,155,582.43 they are in arrears of payment would be in the United States Treasury instead of being an eyesore to us and a disgrace to Europe.

The funding agreements provide that those bonds would be identical in character and appearance as all other outstanding bonds in countries like France and England and would, of course, be marketable on the same basis as all other of their outstanding bonds and while it is possible that under circumstances such as exist today, the bonds might be selling below par but we could well afford to sell them at prevailing prices and have done away with all this talk about cancelation or reduction of war debts.

So I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that if the gentlemen on that side of the aisle are really sincere in their desire to force reciprocal trade agreements with Europe, you have the most powerful weapon in the world in your own hands—the obligation of these debtor nations which can be divided into bonds of small denomination and sold on the markets of the world. It is up to the Roosevelt administration to ask for an exchange of those bonds.

I say we ought to do it now. We have never pressed our greatest financial opportunity. It was not done under the Hoover administration, and has not been done by the present administration. You ought to do it, for it is your greatest trump card. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I do not impugn the good intentions of the President in his request to Congress to authorize the Executive to enter into executive commercial agreements with foreign nations, but I cannot agree with his policy or the application of the principles of his policy which has been enunciated by Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, in his booklet entitled "America Must Choose."

The asking of Congress for power to negotiate and conclude tariff treaties without the consent of the Senate, without the guidance of the Tariff Commission, is bearing on absolutism, and is not in keeping with the spirit or intent of the preamble of the Constitution of the United States or the Constitution itself.

It has been a long well-established policy and long accepted by the American people not to involve themselves in foreign entanglements. History relates to us that greed, avarice, and intrigue form the background of most foreign nations, and nothing of such a nature is present in the background of our Nation. We have reached the great position we have in the world today by our own industry and effort, and there is no reason to subject the policies of other nations to our country.

The first witness who appeared at the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means endorsing H.R. 8430 was Secretary of State Cordell Hull.

Secretary Hull is, in my opinion, a fine gentleman, but he is also, in my opinion, the most intolerant and arrogant free trader in the United States today. He is this country's gift to internationalism. His archaic delusions on the whole history of tariff make him a dangerous man in the high office which he holds. When the Secretary of State was a Member of this body and a Member of the Senate practically all his speeches were for free trade and against protection, and he particularly centered his attack on the wool industry which means so much to the Western States.

Under the protection of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill the importation of wool has dropped from the value of almost $50,000,000 to the approximate value of $7,000,000 for the year 1933. I am for a higher tariff on wool to keep out the $7,000,000 worth of wool that was imported in 1933. Prophesying the future by his acts in the past, I predict that Secretary Hull will continue his attacks on the wool industry.

Secretary Wallace, the second witness called to defend this bill, is according to his own statement an internationalist. In his booklet, America Must Choose, published last month, page 2, he states:

My own bias is international. It is an inborn attitude with me. I have very deeply the feeling that nations should be naturally friendly to each other and express that friendship in international trade.

And on page 33 of the same publication Secretary Wallace states as follows:

The internationalist does not regard loans as the only means of brightening those prospects and enlarging them. He holds that there is no possible way of making loans eventually secure unless we become import-minded. He would rather trust to tariff concessions and other means of developing trade reciprocity. * * * I lean to the international solution.

In regards to the cattle and dairy industry, page 9, he says:

Two or more years ago a number of observers, myself among them, were warning American beef cattlemen and the dairymen to look out for overproduction of milk and beef in 3 or 4 years. We said that the tariff, which has been somewhat effective on dairy and beef products during the greater part of the last 5 or 6 years, was certain to be almost completely ineffective when our production passed a certain point.

Since the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill became effective the value of imported cattle has dropped from an average of around $20,000,000 to about one half a million dollars in 1933. A reciprocal tariff agreement on beef cattle would wreck the cattle industry that at present is having a hard time to keep its head above water.

Let us take a further slant on the views of Secretary Wallace. Again quoting from his own statements, page 18, he says as follows:

Traditionally the Democratic Party is the party of low tariffs. Actually Democratic administrations have never made changes in the tariff structure great enough to increase foreign purchasing power to the extent demanded by the present world dilemma. If we are going to increase foreign purchasing power enough to sell abroad our normal surpluses of cotton, wheat, and tobacco at a decent price, we shall have to accept nearly a billion dollars more goods from abroad than we did in 1929. We shall have to get that much more in order to service the debts that are coming to us from abroad and have enough left over to pay us a fair price for what we send abroad.

That will involve a radical reduction in tariffs. That might seriously hurt certain industries and a few kinds of agricultural businesses, such as sugar-beet growing and flax growing. It might also cause pain for a while to woolgrowers and to farmers who supply material for various edible oils. I think we ought to face that fact. If we are going to lower tariffs radically, there may have to be some definite planning whereby certain industries or businesses will have to be retired.

The newspapers today are carrying an account of the storm that is brewing between the dairy marketing organization and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to Secretary Wallace's attitude as that of an internationalist, he has been Secretary of Agriculture since March 1933. Can the gentleman point to any policy under the A.A.A. promulgated by him that savors of internationalism?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No; but I am taking his own words for it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I understand that; but I am talking about the policies under his leadership. Curtailment of production is the antithesis of internationalism.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. And that is the reason why I cannot see how he comes out and endorses this bill, which favors internationalism, and at the same time he is in favor of the A.A.A. There is a great inconsistency there. I cannot see how he can back one bill which favors nationalism and then a few weeks later back a bill that favors internationalism.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. To be fair with the Secretary, the gentleman has not read all of that pamphlet, because in that pamphlet he deals with nationalism as well as internationalism.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I cannot yield further.

This view is in keeping with his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee a few weeks ago when the sugar quota bill was up for discussion, when he said he could visualize the destruction of the sugar-beet industry.

Whom would the President turn to for advice, aid, and comfort when reciprocal agreements on agriculture are up for consideration but to the Secretary of State and Secretary of Agriculture? Their personal views are against wool, sugar beets, and beef cattle, the chief industries of the West. They cannot but help reflect their own personal views to the President which will mean the retarding of these industries, a great blow to the economic recovery of the West.

I believe in economic nationalism. I was born an American. I can never be anything else but an American, and I think first of the United States.

We are the most self-sufficing nation in the world today. The talk of sending our surplus abroad when we have millions of unemployed men and women in this country depending on charity for food is appalling to me.

What we need is proper distribution and balance. Create our own national economy so we will not be disturbed by what goes on in the outside world. This cannot be done through reciprocal agreements, which will throw our gates open to foreign trade and create more unemployment.

The purpose of the Agricultural Adjustment Act was to bring production of products in proportion to consumption. This bill will mean the importation of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of products. The Secretary of Agriculture endorses both, although diametrically opposed in policy. This seems most inconsistent to me.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH].

FOLLOWING PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S LEADERSHIP

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am convinced that the fears and views of the gentlemen of the minority side, who have just preceded me, Mr. CARTER, of Wyoming, Mr. BRITTEN, of Illinois, and Mr. WOODRUFF, of Michigan, are unfounded.

During my service as a Member of this body from March 9, 1933, when Congress was convened in special session, down to this present moment, I have loyally and diligently supported to the utmost of my ability and energy each and every major legislative proposal of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, with the single exception of veterans' legislation, in regard to which I pledged myself in the preelection campaigns in 1932, and that pledge, as well as every other pledge I then made to the citizens of the Third Washington District, I have faithfully kept.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S MESSAGE

President Roosevelt in his message proposing this legislation said:

Every nation must at all times be in a position quickly to adjust its taxes and tariffs to meet sudden changes and avoid severe fluctuations in both its exports and its imports. * * * The executive branches of virtually all other important trading countries already possess some such power. * * * The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed. * * * From the policy of reciprocal negotiation which is in prospect, I hope in time that definite gains will result to the American agriculture and industry.

WILL FOLLOW PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AGAIN

Mr. Chairman, I intend to follow the leadership of President Roosevelt again today and vote in favor of this measure to grant him the necessary authority to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations and to modify and change our tariff duties, because it is my firm conviction that he will exercise that authority for the benefit and welfare of the American people in the same salutary manner and extent as all his other official acts since his inauguration a year ago.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ACTION ON DEPRECIATED FOREIGN CURRENCY

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful, nor are the people of southwest Washington whom I have the honor to represent in Congress during this most crucial period in our national history, of the prompt and decisive action of President Roosevelt last spring in taking the United States off the gold standard and thereby protecting American labor, industry, and agriculture against the unfair competition resulting from the depreciated foreign currencies. For several years previously the average depreciation of world currency was 39 percent, and our average tariff rate 16.4 percent, so that our tariff duties were completely nullified, and, as a direct result, foreign manufacturers successfully invaded our markets, for not only was the advantage derived from the difference in exchange sufficient to absorb the tariff, but all the costs of transportation, brokerage commissions, and expenses of every kind as well. In southwest Washington this situation demoralized and threatened to destroy the lumber, pulp, shingle, and fish industries, but the Hoover administration did absolutely nothing to meet this serious menace.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ACTION BENEFICIAL TO SOUTHWEST WASHINGTON

President Roosevelt acted promptly and effectively; and almost immediately the stimulation was felt in all lines of industry and business in my district, and there commenced that recovery and improvement in conditions which is still in progress. President Roosevelt's recent action, heartily supported by Congress, in devaluating the gold dollar and establishing a currency stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 will serve to further protect our industries against depreciated foreign currencies in the future.

Mr. Chairman, we therefore have abundant cause and good reason for our belief that President Roosevelt will discharge the prerogatives conferred upon him by this legislation in the interests and for the fair advantage of our own people.

DEMOCRATS IN FAVOR OF TARIFF ON LUMBER

Mr. Chairman, we, in the State of Washington, in common with the entire West, owe little or nothing to the party of Hoover, Coolidge, and Harding, so far as tariff protection is concerned. In the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 and the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, rough lumber was on the free list, with no duty whatever, and during this period our State's congressional representation, in both Houses, was almost entirely Republican. In 1930, when they had an overwhelming majority, the vote in the Senate was so close that the paltry $1 duty on dressed lumber was carried by the single vote of Senator COPELAND, of New York, a Democrat. In 1932, the $3 duty on rough lumber was attached to the revenue bill with duty on copper, coal, and oil, when the West and South combined against the East, which had dictated tariff policies and legislation for many years, and placed no duties upon any important industrial or agricultural product produced or manufactured west of the Mississippi River, but imposed exorbitant duties on the manufactured goods of the extreme Eastern States.

In 1932 when the $3 duty was placed on rough lumber, 12 Democratic Senators led by Senator DILL voted for the lumber tariff and 5 other Democratic Senators were paired for the tariff on lumber; total, 17 Democrats in all. Eleven Republicans voted "no" and 10 Republicans were paired against it, making a total of 21 Republicans opposed to the lumber tariff. On May 31, 1932, the Senate voted on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the lumber tariff was adopted; 19 Democrats voted "no" and 13 Republicans voted "aye." (See p. 12020 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) This degree of protection, as we have already noted, was completely nullified by the increasing depreciation in foreign currencies until President Roosevelt and Congress took the United States off the gold standard.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT FAVORS ADEQUATE TARIFFS—LUMBER

Adequate safeguards are needed to protect our American standards of labor, industrial as well as agricultural. A tariff is still essential to meet those safeguards and to produce revenue—are the words of President Roosevelt, and we in the Far West believe that in reciprocal trade agreements negotiated under this act lumber and shingles will receive full and just consideration.

To cite the benefits of preferential trade agreements, the following shows the trend of export business of British Columbia as compared, with the States of Oregon and Washington before and following the trade agreements between the British countries:

Year:	British Columbia		Washington and Oregon
	Preferential market	Open market	Preferential market	Open market
	Percent	Percent	Percent	Percent
1928	5.9	13.1	15.0	66.0
1929	7.0	12.8	18.2	62.0
1930	10.8	14.6	18.9	55.7
1931	12.0	16.1	11.5	60.4
1932	27.4	13.2	7.0	52.4
1933	33.2	16.3	5.5	45.0

This data has been supplied by Mr. L. E. Force, of Douglas Fir Co., Seattle, as the spokesman for the operators of 91 sawmills in the States of Washington and Oregon.

In negotiations with Great Britain, Canada, and Australia, lumber must be protected if this important major industry is to survive, following the severe test to which it has been subjected in recent years. There is no other industry in the United States which needs assistance more than the lumber industry at the present time and as it constitutes a national-resources industry, and is the basic industry of the Pacific Northwest, it is deserving of every possible consideration, equally important with cotton, tobacco, hog products, rice, cereals, and agricultural commodities.

SHINGLE INDUSTRY NEEDS PROTECTION

Shingles, now duty free, must be considered in reciprocal trade agreements with Canada. There are 240 red-cedar shingle mills in the States of Washington and Oregon, scattered in as many communities, employing 3,500 skilled employees in actual manufacturing and approximately 2,200 men employed in the logging camps supplying these mills with cedar logs. When these mills and camps are in operation their total pay roll is $28,000 per day. The daily expenditures of the shingle mills alone for saws and supplies is estimated at $18,000 per day. The daily freight revenue developed in the shipment of the manufactured shingles is approximately $26,500 per day. Total, $73,000 per day, or figuring 25 working days, $1,725,000 per month. These figures have been furnished to me by Mr. Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the Washington & Oregon Shingle Association, and I have every confidence that they are correct.

Mr. Chairman, this important industry is fighting for its very existence, threatened with extinction by the competition of the shingles manufactured by the cheap Hindoo and Chinese coolie labor of British Columbia, while our shingle industry was one of the very first industries in the United States to get wholeheartedly behind the N.R.A. and give it immediate, 100-percent support, and thereby it is seriously handicapped and facing bankruptcy and a complete shutdown. The shingle manufacturers of Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia, realizing the situation and that an absolute embargo will otherwise have to be placed against Canadian shingles, agreed several months ago upon an import allocation of 20 percent for British Columbia and 80 percent for the United States, but this agreement, providing for an import allocation certificate, has to be confirmed and carried out under the auspices of the United States Customs Offices, but must first be investigated upon proper complaint to the import division, referred to and heard by the United States Tariff Commission, and eventually go to the President for final decision, which forcibly illustrates the interminable red-tape which President Roosevelt mentions in his message and which he is seeking to avoid by the enactment into law of this legislation. During this protracted delay, what is transpiring?

The entire Pacific Northwest watches in amazement the inability of the American mills to operate and produce their 80 percent of the consumption, whereas the Canadian manufacturers, exempt from any of the restraints of the N.R.A., are shipping into the United States huge and increasing volumes of shingles, far in excess of their 20-percent quota. The following table will illustrate the situation:

	American allocation (80 percent)	American production	British Columbia imports allocation (20 percent)	Actual imports U.S. Customs figures
1933:	Squares	Squares	Squares	Squares
September	280,000	291,488	70,000	145,218
October	518,040	332,304	123,510	145,404
November	233,072	179,808	58,270	116,738
December		171,515		73,930
1934: January		117,325		74,145

Calling to mind that one of the primary purposes of the N.R.A. is to increase and spread employment, the next statement is worthy of emphasis: Every 30 squares of shingles imported throws 4 American shingle-mill employees out of work for 1 day.

THIS LEGISLATION A WEAPON OF DEFENSE

Mr. Chairman, the plight of the lumber and shingle industry, as well as the agricultural and fish industries in the Pacific Northwest, furnishes striking justification for our placing in the hands of President Roosevelt this weapon which he can, and will, wield in defense of the rights and interests of American labor, American industry, and American agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HENNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 8687, the tariff bill, 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER NEAR BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3067) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON]?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the bill which the gentleman spoke to me about, which was reported out by the gentleman's committee favorably?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; that is the same bill.

Mr. SNELL. There is no objection, Mr. Speaker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Louisiana Highway Commission, an administrative body created and acting under the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge, or a railway bridge in combination with a free highway bridge, and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Baton Rouge, La., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the majority leader a question. Many Members have asked, if the Senate should act on the independent offices appropriation bill, whether there will be any disposition on the part of the majority leader to have that bill called up tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNS. I will state that I talked with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum], chairman of the subcommittee, today with a view of learning just what would be done. The gentleman assured me that under no circumstances would he ask for any action before Monday upon that bill, regardless of what the Senate may do or when it may act.

UNITED STATES SHOULD GRANT COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE TO THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record on the United States granting complete independence to the Philippines.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the short time that I am privileged, by unanimous consent, to address the House, I shall deal with one of the outstanding legislation achievements of the present Congress—the grant of independence to the Philippines, the bill having passed the Senate yesterday by a vote of 68 to 8, and is now awaiting the signature of the President at the White House.

In discussing the question of independence for the Philippine Islands, there are two main lines of argument. One is based upon the familiar declaration "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The other is based upon the theory that the Philippines are not capable of self-government, and, coming to us through a treaty of peace with Spain, are a national charge for which we must remain responsible.

Those who claim that it is our duty to deny self-government to the Philippines argue that we are more capable of deciding what are the rights of the islanders to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness than they are themselves; that they came into our hands through an act of Providence; that the great expansion of the Orient makes it advantageous to hold the islands as a vantage point in the world's competition; and that our protectorate will advance the cause of Christianity.

When we analyze these claims, we find them based only on our own supposed advantage, not that of the natives. There is no wish to give them the benefits of that independence which has been our boasted heritage for nearly a hundred and fifty years.

But this is a question of right and justice and not of sentiment. We cannot ignore this element of right and wrong by substituting selfish interests under the disguise of providential care. Monarchical governments claim the right to hold and govern without considering subjects' claims. Republics hold that this doctrine is despotic, and cannot be tolerated in any measure whatever. Either it is self-government or it is government by others. Because we stand upon a certain high plane of power and influence does not imply the right to trespass upon those who occupy a lower plane.

From a standpoint of our own history we recognize the wrong, but then we argue that our history cannot apply to the Philippine Islands. We were capable of self-government, but these people are not. When we make this claim, we take the same stand as that taken by King George in 1776. It is an identical situation. Parliament sought to retain sovereignty of the American Colonies and a war of conquest ensued. Our ancestors won, and the Declaration of Independence has ever since been the bulwark of our liberties.

The people of the Philippines have repeatedly sought to establish the same rights of self-government. They fought Spain for their freedom for more than 100 years. Rebellion has marked the early history of this people just as it marked our own. Is it in keeping with the traditions and spirit of America to deny them what we consider our most priceless possession?

The assertion that only politicians desire independence for the Philippines is perilous stuff to be circulated in this country. It is untrue and misleading. These people have a background of 350 years of struggle for liberty. They have their historic heroes as dear to them as Winkleried to the Swiss and Emmet to the Irish. They have their records of brave deeds, wonderful sacrifices, daring revolutions. American history, taught in their schools for 22 years, has fortified and increased their own love of freedom. They have set their hearts upon independence and nationality and will never be satisfied with anything else. We may, if we please, shoot them into submission, but we cannot kill their aspirations. For all our guns and all our troops, they will henceforth be our reluctant subjects.

The people of the Philippines received with deep resentment the news of the findings of the Wood-Forbes mission. The substance of this report consists, in plain terms, of reasons discovered why we should disregard our promises and keep the islands. When this fact was discovered by the natives, only the swift and skillful efforts of their leaders prevented a popular demonstration that would have left the people of the United States in no uncertainty as to the real feelings of the islanders.

One phase of the contest Americans at home will easily understand if they will look beneath the arguments urged against independence. Nothing could be simpler. Under American rule, Philippine products are admitted to the United States duty free, with the result that a large trade has been developed in Philippine staples. With independence, American tariff duties would be effective against all these, and American capital invested in them would suffer loss. And what are these staples? Tobacco, sugar, hemp, lumber, and vegetable oil. And to what doors do these investments lead? To the greatest and most powerful financial interests in America. And how far off are the interests that induced us to intervene in Haiti? Not a block. Should not this open all our eyes?

Of two other facts in our relations with this people we can be reasonably sure. First, the agitation for independence will grow until we can no longer ignore or belittle it. Second, if that crisis shall require the armed force of the United States again to confront a people struggling to be free, it will be no excursion for pleasure. An ill country is this for white men to fight in.

By the act of August 29, 1916, the United States pledged itself to grant independence to the Philippines "as soon as a stable government can be established therein." Of other conditions, not a word. For more than 10 years the people of the Philippines have conducted a government that rests upon their own mandate. Has it been stable?

President McKinley said that a stable government was "one capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity, and the security of its citizens." Judged by these standards, no more stable government has existed anywhere for these 10 years. The Philippines have fulfilled their part of the contract. We must fulfill ours or violate it, and that in short order.

H.R. 3842—THE PASSAGE OF THIS IMPORTANT AMENDMENT TO THE IMMIGRATION LAWS, WHICH HAS BEEN PENDING FOR THE PAST 10 YEARS, WILL STOP THE ANNUAL SMUGGLING INTO THE UNITED STATES OF 50,000 ALIENS AS "SEAMEN"

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks with regard to H.R. 3842.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation, which has been sought for the past decade by the American Federation of Labor and by the International Seamen's Union of America, is to put a stop to the smuggling of aliens into the United States under the guise of seamen. The official records show that during the past 25 years in excess of 500,000 so-called "seamen" deserted vessels entering our ports and remained in the country in violation of our immigration and exclusion laws. Considerable sums of money—in some cases as high as $1,100—have been paid by Chinese in order to obtain entrance to the United States in this unlawful manner.

THE PAST HISTORY OF THIS LEGISLATION

I quote from the veteran Member from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]:

I am, indeed, pleased that I have a chance for the first time to favor the adoption of this bill on the floor of this House, because up to this session . . . the bill never was reported by the former Chairman of the Committee on Immigration [Mr. JOHNSON]. . . . Whenever we had the bill up in our committee he would invariably find many excuses for not reporting it to the House. So for nearly 10 years, although a majority of the Committee on Immigration was in favor of the bill, we never could get consideration of it on the floor of the House.

In the Seamen's Journal, May 1931, appears the following:

WHO STRANGLED THE KING BILL?

Additional information has been received concerning the somewhat mysterious defeat of the King bill.

Jim Eagan, Washington labor writer, who has a penchant for analyzing things, has supplied the following descriptive comment:

"The King bill was strangled in the House during the final hours of the last Congress. The bill passed the Senate three times. It was intended to stop the annual bootlegging of 50,000 aliens who are smuggled into this country as 'seamen.' Europeans pay from $200 to $400 to get in. Chinamen pay $1,100. When the seamen arrive at an American port, they quietly step ashore and are lost in the large cities. The graft for shipowners is almost as profitable as smuggling opium.

"The bill died in the lap of Speaker Longworth, who refused to recognize any Member for the purpose of presenting a motion that the bill be voted on. The Speaker said he was informed by the Department of State that European nations protested against the bill. Mr. Longworth should have known that it was not his duty to pass judgment on international features of a bill that is before him. It was his duty to permit a vote—which he refused—and then transmit the bill to the President.

"Congressman Johnson of Washington, Chairman of the House Committee on Immigration, gets the blue ribbon as a shipowners' ally. He was caught red-handed dealing from the bottom, and was accused on the floor of the House with urging Congressmen to vote against the bill which his committee forced him to report.

"Johnson poses as a 100-percent American and as a foe of immigration that beats down American living standards. His work for the shipping interests was exposed, and angry colleagues flung into his teeth that he is a trimmer and a double crosser."

MY SUPPORT AND VOTE FOR THIS LEGISLATION—LETTER FROM ANDREW FURUSETH

Mr. Speaker, it has afforded me genuine pleasure to actively support and vote for this meritorious immigration measure; and I shall always treasure and take pride in possessing a letter which I have had the honor to receive from Andrew Furuseth, veteran president of the Seamen's Union, the grand old man of organized labor, who for many years has been fighting for this type of immigration legislation to protect the real, bona fide seamen of the United States and prevent the smuggling of large numbers of Asiatics, Mexicans, and other aliens into this country. Mr. Furuseth writes me under date of March 10, 1934:

Please receive the sincere thanks from the seamen and from myself, who transmits it, for your action in voting for, and in making an effort to get others to vote for the bill which the former Congressman from your district succeeded in keeping from the consideration of the House for 10 years.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ADAMS, for today, on account of important business.

To Mr. SNYDER, for 2 days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 257. An act to authorize full settlement for professional services rendered to an officer of the United States Army;

H.R. 6604. An act to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties; to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes;

H.R. 8573. An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes; and

H.J.Res. 207. Joint resolution requiring agricultural or other products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other instrumentality of the Government finances the exporting of such products.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, March 24, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

TITLE OF UNITED STATES TO LANDS IN TERRITORIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, there has been passed by the other House of Congress H.R. 5863, being a bill which in effect, declares that the principle of the common law that title to lands by prescription cannot be acquired as against the Government shall be applicable to all places under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Since the passage of the bill by the House, an identical bill, introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], being S. 1699, has passed the Senate. I ask that the House bill be laid before the Senate, and ask the Secretary to read the bill. Then I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, and if the House bill shall be passed, I shall then request that the Senate bill be recalled and indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H.R. 5863) to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter no prescription or statute of limitations shall run, or continue to run, against the title of the United States to lands in any Territory or possession or place or Territory under the jurisdiction or control of the United States, including the Philippine Islands; and that no title to any such lands of the United States or any right therein shall be acquired by adverse possession or prescription, or otherwise than by conveyance from the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question in regard to this measure. I note the word "hereafter" is contained in the first line of the bill. That would imply that before the passage of this bill the statute of limitations would run against the Government. I do not want to concede that implication, because I do not think that it is legally correct. No prescriptive right may run against the Government, and the word "hereafter", it seems to me, should not be in the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am not equipped legally to measure swords with the able Senator from Utah, who is a distinguished lawyer, but I beg him to remember that the common-law principle, to wit, that no time runs against the sovereign, has always, of course, applied to continental United States, and that in some of our possessions this common-law principle did not and does not obtain; and, strange as it may seem, time did run against the sovereign in some of these possessions. This bill simply provides that hereafter in our possessions no title shall run against the United States by prescription, to wit, by lapse of time, and that the common-law rule, with which the able Senator is familiar, that no title may be acquired against the United States by prescription shall obtain in those possessions.

I ask that there may be read at the desk a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, which explains the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 23, 1934.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: I have received your letter of February 1 requesting a report on S. 1699, entitled "A bill to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription."

The bill in effect declares that the principle of the common law, that title by prescription cannot be acquired as against the sovereign, shall be applicable in all places under the jurisdiction or control of the United States, including the Philippine Islands. In the case of Carino v. Insular Government (212 U.S. 449) it was recognized that title by prescription against the Crown existed under Spanish law in force in the Philippine Islands prior to their acquisition by the United States, and that one occupying land in the Province of Benguet for more than 50 years before the Treaty of Paris is entitled to the continued possession thereof.

I am not aware of any objection to the proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object. I had in mind particularly Alaska where, my recollection is, the organic act provided that the common law with all its limitations should be the controlling factor. However, I shall not object.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not favor the practice of taking bills off the calendar unless it is a very serious emergency. Am I to understand that the bill once passed the Senate, that an identical bill has passed the House, and that the Senator now asks to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order will be entered requesting the House of Representatives to return the Senate bill and accompanying papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed on March 23, 1934, the act (S. 356) for the relief of the Great American Indemnity Co. of New York.

THE LAND POLICY OF THE WEST

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I desire to submit in a few minutes a request to have printed in the RECORD an article upon the land policy of the West, a very important and able article written by Marshall N. Dana, which I think is of very great importance at this time.

It seems important and timely that the general attitude of the western reclamation States be made clear regarding a national land policy, such as has been indicated by the President, by the Secretary of Agriculture, and by the Secretary of the Interior, relating to marginal lands, economic feasibility, market outlets, and other factors.

The Department of Agriculture, on the authority delegated by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, is attempting to work out a program of unified, balanced, and controlled agricultural production. This program necessitates extensive surveys of land productiveness, market outlets, transportation facilities, and social consequences. Ultimately these extensive surveys and experiments should produce a well-defined national land policy.

Representing, as I do in part, one of the public-land States, a State in which the Federal Government owns some 56 percent of the land area, I am exceedingly desirous that the claims of agriculture in these States shall be given full consideration under this new program.

As every Senator knows, agriculture in the public-land States is directly dependent upon reclamation. Vast areas of arid land have been transformed into tens of thousands of fertile, productive farms. Hundreds of cities have grown up, railroads and highways have been constructed, and withal entire States have been erected on this foundation of reclaimed land, the fruition largely of our Federal reclamation policy.

But obvious as these facts are, there is an appalling lack of understanding of the actual operations of this policy. Many otherwise well-informed people have the rather vague idea that reclamation is based on a form of Government subsidy, comparable with the vast appropriations for rivers and harbors. Just recently I heard the statement made that making appropriations for reclamation is like "pouring water into a rat hole." Such statements disclose an inexcusable ignorance of our national reclamation policy and its results.

The Federal reclamation fund which has been used in building the great public-land States of the West, is held inviolable as a permanent revolving fund and the money expended for reclamation is eventually repaid. Despite the depression, about 95 percent of payments due the Federal Government have been repaid to this revolving fund.

There has come to my attention a recent statement by Mr. Marshall N. Dana, president of the National Reclamation Association, chairman of the Pacific Northwest Regional Planning Commission, and formerly regional advisor of Public Works Administration of Portland, Oreg. This statement bears the title "The West Must Farm", and is a remarkably clear, able, and concise statement on this important matter.

Mr. Dana points out in his timely article that reclamation will stand the most rigid test of a scientifically controlled agriculture; that it will be found consistent with a national land policy which seeks to eliminate marginal lands and to coordinate production with consumer demands, economic marketing, and transportation facilities. He puts to rout arguments that irrigated areas materially increase surpluses and that our Federal reclamation policy includes an element of Government subsidy. He says:

Farming by aid of irrigation in Western States is a necessary method. These are the "public-land States", where 52 percent of the total area is owned by the United States Government. In 1902, by congressional act, the Government recognized its responsibility as a majority landowner by setting up a revolving fund in aid of reclamation. The fund was derived from 52 percent of the proceeds from sales of public lands and from oil, gas, and other leases. Forty-eight percent of the proceeds from these sources went into the National Treasury. Contracts were entered into with districts and progressively modified so that today settlers obligate themselves to repay in 40 years without interest the full amount advanced by the Government in building reclamation works. These repayments augment the revolving fund. In 1932, $208,000,000 had been spent from the reclamation fund, $42,000,000 had been repaid, and settlers, despite the depression, were only 6 percent in arrears on construction payments. At the same time, 42,000 farms were in operation, 227 cities and towns had been established, annual crop values had reached $100,000,000, and assessed values had been created totaling $2,500,000,000. The people on reclamation projects in 1930 were customers of eastern manufacturers to the extent of $120,000,000, or 95,000 carloads. Incident to the allocation of money to continue the authorized reclamation program under the Public Works Administration, it was found that for every person employed in reclamation construction, approximately two workers were given jobs in the industrial East. Some of the largest and most powerful devices ever employed in the combinations of land and water for human benefit have been created from eastern and midwestern industries for western reclamation projects.

And while these are large figures demonstrating a signally successful enterprise, it is also true that Federal reclamation projects contain only four tenths of 1 percent of the Nation's cultivated land. The farmed land of Iowa alone is greater in acreage than the entire area of western irrigation. The products of Federal reclamation projects represent only three fourths of 1 percent of the total annual values of American agriculture.

Nor are reclamation products in competition with the products of other sections or contributors to the agricultural surplus. Feed is grown for winter use to balance summer range. The needs of western cities, mining, ports, and/or transportation are partially supplied with fruits, dairy products, vegetables, nuts, long-staple cotton, alfalfa, sugar beets, and grass seeds. Not enough wheat is grown on the reclamation projects to supply the people living on these projects, the average being about 2,500,000 bushels, as compared with a normal American crop of 800,000,000 bushels.

And that, if anyone looks at it fairly, is just about all there is to the reclamation bogey of "subsidy" and "surplus."

Like the other bogies that find substance in ignorance and prejudice, it dissolves before the facts and reveals one of the most magnificent accomplishments for human benefit and progress ever recorded.

A high standard of honor and responsibility has uniformly been maintained in the contractual relations between settlers on the Federal reclamation projects and the Government. Of "repudiation" proposals there have been few, and these usually instigated by unscrupulous individuals who sought, for fees, to impose upon the credulity or to exploit the necessities of settlers. In actual emergencies, created by economic depression or by unforeseen contingencies in the construction and administration of projects, Congress and the administrative divisions of the Government have dealt justly and generously. The National Reclamation Association takes an unqualified position in favor of keeping reclamation contracts, both in letter and spirit, and is equally opposed to repudiation. The association believes all necessary adjustment may be made directly with the representatives of the Government, and without the intervention of mercenaries. We do not thereby refer to legitimate professional services.

One of the great engineering organizations of the world has been developed incident to the Reclamation Service. The experience gained is of incalculable value in construction and administration. Research and scientific knowledge, increased by cooperative agencies, have aided not reclamation alone but all agriculture in signal improvement of production and marketing.

The strategic importance in the national defense of a staunch and balanced development of the West is incalculable. Facing the Orient and desiring, first of all, profitable trade relations with the billion people who live around the shores of the Pacific, we feel that to maintain western progress in full strength and vigor is part of an issue of national integrity.

We have encountered the suggestion of a "unified" agriculture. It apparently means that one section may exclusively supply the Nation's food needs. No one section in America is capable of so doing—not even the West. It is impossible from the standpoints of climate, geography, transportation, and distribution. The great rate division at the crest of the Continental Divide forbids.

To remove agriculture from all but one area would paralyze the others. It would eliminate margins and reservoirs for emergency. And even if the Mississippi Valley were chosen for "unified" agriculture, what would be done when that great region was bathed with flood or parched with drought? Consider, too, the spectacle of the East all factories and the West all hot-dog stands and filling stations for tourists.

Infinitely preferable is a planned development that, while desirable for the West, is equally important to the Nation.

The utilization of natural resources, the control of floods and the unifying of stream flow, the guidance of agriculture and settlement, the relationships and integration of transportation and industry, the methods employed, and the habits of life all are best conducted by orderly procedure not rigidly standardized but sufficiently flexible to stimulate the exceptional in personality and achievement, and not superimposed but derived from the intelligence, the ambitions, the living standards, and the ideals of the people.

An admirable expression of the ideal and the vision of national reclamation is contained in the message from the President of the United States and presented to the Second Annual Convention of the National Reclamation Association at Boise, Idaho, November 28. It reads as follows:

"I do not want to let the occasion of the second annual meeting of the National Reclamation Association go by without sending you my greetings and best wishes. May your deliberations result in mutual benefit to Federal water users and the public generally.

"Reclamation as a Federal policy has proven its worth and has a very definite place in our economic existence. Spread over one third of the territory of the United States and creating taxable values and purchasing power affecting municipal, State, and Federal Governments and private industry, it is only reasonable that we should all take pride in its achievements and success.

"The National Industrial Recovery Administration, more popularly known as 'N.R.A.', is designed to pull us out of the depression; and that it is accomplishing its purpose is acclaimed everywhere. I hope the fact that your association has the same initials is significant and that the two may gradually but surely help the farmer to economic independence with the active cooperation of the administration.

"Very sincerely yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

This is the western picture. There are unchangeable limitations upon valleys of the West, verdant and almost magically productive when watered from the mountains, Nature's reservoirs, rising in their splendor. Farms cannot be continuous as upon flat prairie expanses. The variety of land and of topography creates a corresponding variety in living. For every acre suitable for farming there will be numerous acres suitable for fun. Land marginal for agriculture may be grade A for recreation and inspiration. In other words, Nature in the West supplies the facilities of diversified production and the setting for completely rounded personalities, as strong, as hardy, as creative, as rich in happiness as Nature herself.

We hold that no greater service has been rendered to the social progress of America than the amazing and successful contribution made by reclamation, as a national policy, in rendering fully available for their utility and their beauty the mountains and the forests, the rivers and the valleys, the lakes and the ocean shores of the West. It is one of the true forward steps of the Nation.

Mr. Dana tells the romantic story of the irrigated West and the results of our national policy of reclamation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it not true that our reclamation policy is essentially one of conservation of both natural and human resources?

Mr. POPE. That is entirely true.

Mr. President, I now ask that the article of Mr. Dana may be printed in the RECORD in full as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WEST MUST FARM

(A statement by Marshall N. Dana, president National Reclamation Association)

The National Reclamation Association is heartily in sympathy with steps now being taken by the national administration to subject all agricultural lands to the test of economic productive value.

We not only favor the elimination of land that cannot be farmed with profit under what may be termed normal conditions but we are ready for a more advanced step.

We would suggest that every farm tract be subjected to the test of (1) economic feasibility and (2) the need of its products in (a) local or regional markets and (b) national and/or world markets.

Further, we believe it to be a manifest duty of the United States Government, through its several departments, to establish a national land policy and, in conformity, not only to seek the elimination of demonstrably marginal lands but to assure the profitable use of good land through the solution of production problems, the improvement and cheapening of transportation, and the enhancement of marketing opportunities.

We believe that the prejudice which sectionally divides American agriculture should be removed by general recognition that each section is entitled to its agriculture as a balancing factor in secure living and general progress.

We believe that the quarrel as to whether lands shall be farmed in the manner that controlling climatic conditions necessitate—that is, by the aid of natural precipitation or water artificially applied—should be replaced by the rigid tests of feasibility.

We agree that national land policy may support all necessary farming methods and that western reclamation should feel a common purpose and sympathy in midwestern flood control and eastern-southern rehabilitation of impoverished soil.

We think that the positions taken by Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, against farm slums and by Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, against alienation of Government ownership of the public domain are eminently fair and right.

Now, as to reclamation in a national land program, we think the following facts should receive just appraisal:

Farming by aid of irrigation in Western States is a necessary method. These are the public-land States, where 52 percent of the total area is owned by the United States Government. In 1902, by congressional act, the Government recognized its responsibility as a majority landowner by setting up a revolving fund in aid of reclamation. For every acre suitable for farming there will be numerous acres suitable for fun. Land marginal for agriculture may be grade A for recreation and inspiration. In other words, Nature in the West supplies the facilities of diversified production and the setting for completely rounded personalities, as strong, as hardy, as creative, as rich in happiness as Nature herself.

We hold that no greater service has been rendered to the social progress of America than the amazing and successful contribution made by reclamation, as a national policy, in rendering fully available for their utility and their beauty, the mountains and the forests, the rivers and the valleys, the lakes and the ocean shores of the West. It is one of the true forward steps of the Nation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3067) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.

STOCK-EXCHANGE REGULATION—STATEMENT BY JUDGE WILLIAM CLARK

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been greatly impressed by the testimony of Judge William Clark before the Banking and Currency Committee, March 6, 1934, on proposed stock-exchange regulation. I ask permission to have Judge Clark's remarks inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have accepted your committee's kind invitation to impose on their time for one reason only. I have strong feelings on the subject of the margin section of the proposed bill. I believe that section does not go far enough. I believe that the stock exchange should be put on a cash basis. Those feelings and that belief are not manufactured for this occasion, nor are they simply the result of cloistered thinking by an enfeebled intellect. In 10 years on the Federal bench I have had personal observation of the tragic consequences of margin trading in three respects:

First, I have had to send men to prison because they had used the money intrusted to them by poor depositors to "protect" (God save the mark!) their margin accounts. The district attorney for my district advises me that about one half of our national-bank embezzlements in the last 5 years are the result of stock speculation. The Department of Justice informs me that the average for the country generally runs as high as 60 percent. If you examine the records of bonding companies and of prosecutors' offices, you will, I think, find that officers in State institutions and public officials have been equally inclined to use other people's money for investment (sic) in the stock exchange. The judicial function of punishment is always heartrending to exercise. In the case of certain classes of crimes the nature of the offense and of the person committing it leaves the emphasis on the necessity for protecting society. To sentence a drug peddler is one thing; to punish a leading citizen of the community for betraying the neighbors who trusted him is quite another. Furthermore, in dealing with the professional criminal one has the feeling that the causes of his erring (environment, inheritance, physical and mental condition, etc.) are deep-rooted in any civilization and yield only gradually to elimination. In the case of the bank officer, however, there is obviously only one cause—his inability to resist the insidious temptation of following the crowd in seeking what looks like safe and easy money.

Second. There has been since 1929 an increasing number of suits in my court on insurance policies where, under the terms of the standard policy, the issue was: Accident or suicide. The company has been, therefore, obliged to establish motive, and in nearly every instance the motive has been "wiped out in the stock market." The number of these cases caused me to inquire of insurance executives about the causes of suicide under straight-life policies. The answer was again mostly stock-exchange speculation. The situation became so serious, I am informed, that the companies considered abrogating the 1-year uncontestable clause in their policies. Sometimes this first and second respect can be combined, because the particular bank officer or public official prefers death to dishonor and anticipates the court with a pistol. We had such a case in Princeton, where I live, 2 years ago. The cashier of one of our banks killed himself and it was discovered that a local brokerage office (it has now folded its ledgers and departed) had covered his margins with about one hundred and fiftieth of the bank's money and about 50,000 of the local churches for good measure.

Third. In 1930 and 1931 I conducted, with the aid of the Yale Law School and the Department of Commerce, what we called a "bankruptcy clinic"; we examined a large number of persons who had filed petitions in the New Jersey court for the purpose of discovering the whys and wherefores of their unfortunate condition, hoping that we might be able to chart the seas instead of just salvaging the wreck. We were shocked to find the large number of individuals, both business men and wage earners, who had taken a fling in the market as a sideline, with, of course, fatal results.

My knowledge of these things led me to the conclusion that margin trading in an unconscionable number of cases led to either death, dishonor, or distress. I have been endeavoring for several years now to impart that conclusion to the stock-exchange authorities themselves. Through the newspaper, in speeches, and even through personal correspondence, I have endeavored to suggest that they would be wise to alter a system that fostered such dreadful results. You gentlemen who have experienced the cooperative spirit of the exchange will not be surprised to hear that I didn't accomplish much except, perhaps, qualify myself in their regard for a place in the United States Senate.

In fact, I was met by the same plaintive cry (it reminds me of a sort of financial Mother Carey's chicken) that you must be pretty sick of—"the stock exchange is a market place." One has heard this so often that one almost expects to see the floor brokers becomingly draped in white aprons and to smell fish instead of stocks. One might suppose that Shakespeare's famous phrase had ended the argument by giving a name. The stock exchange is not a market place any more than margin trading is per se gambling. The stock exchange is a very important institution in our economy and should govern itself or be governed according to sound principles of political economy. One of these principles is undoubtedly that it should be a place where stocks can be bought and sold. Another is that it not be a place where people are tempted to indulge in unreasonable risks. Clearly, if everyone could purchase stocks for the asking and without the humiliating necessity of putting up some cash, the number of transactions would increase and multiply and the widow and orphan could sell or buy every split second. (I might digress to remark how curious it is that tears for the widow and orphan appear—like the cuckoo in the cuckoo clock—wherever a utility or stock exchange goes on the operating table.) Equally clearly a margin transaction involves a real risk. It is not gambling in any technical sense. It is simply a purchase-money mortgage with a chose in action (the stock) as security. Because that security is very volatile in its nature it is subject to wide and rapid fluctuations. Because it is subject to those wide and rapid fluctuations the mortgagor purchaser is always in danger of having to bolster the impaired security, and if he can't, of being foreclosed out of his purchase money.

We must, it seems to me, arrive at a social balance between these conflicting values. The widows and orphans can afford to wait a few hours to get their money for their securities in order that others of their fellows may not be widowed or orphaned—for dishonor is a worse form of death—or forced into poverty because their loved ones have succumbed to the temptation of unreasonable risks. How is the social balance to be reached? In my very humble judgment, by putting, as I said in the beginning, the stock exchange on a cash basis.

It would not be too much to say that among the most obvious of the much-talked-about causes of the much-talked-about depression is the abuse of credit. You gentlemen have seen it in your investigation of foreign loans and in your investigation of a few banks. (I have had officially to see something of liquidating national banks, and I can assure you have only scratched the surface there; you would be surprised at what the risks insured against would have been if we had had deposit insurance.) You have not seen as much as I have, perhaps, of the great American institution of installment selling. During the glad gone days it was fashionable to exalt that system. Personally I never could see the soundness of buying anything but necessities until the money was in the bank. It costs more, it is subject to the whims of fate, and it only anticipates enjoyment at the expense of thrift. However that may be, we who investigated the 1,000 bankruptcies I have spoken of had ample opportunity to observe the economic effect of the unbridled installment mania of the last decade. The installment houses, like the stockbrokers, point with pride to the fact that they lost nothing. That is no doubt true. It is the poor fools that fall for the blandishments of both that have done the losing.

No one will maintain that stocks are necessities in the sense that shelter, covering, food, and transportation are essential to human welfare. There seems no good reason, accordingly, why stocks should not be paid for by money that has first been saved, rather than that the saving should come out of the rise or fall of the market. That is certainly true in all cases where the mortgagor purchaser is not in a credit position to meet the fluctuations of his security.

Who determines that mortgagor purchaser's credit position? As things are now the one man least fitted to do so—the broker. Least fitted for two reasons. He has not the capacity or the incentive. I do not propose to discuss the personal characteristics of stockbrokers. There are no doubt many who compare with judges to the disadvantage of the latter. It is a fact, however, that the business as at present constituted is not conducive to the development of inherent talent. The floor trading could certainly be carried on by Western Union messengers and it has been even suggested that a pari-mutuel system could be worked out. The office work is largely routine, and the chief difference between a bad broker and a good broker seems to be in his ability to make friends—a beautiful quality, surely, but sometimes expensive for the friends. In France a member of the Bourse has to be both a chartered accountant and a member of the bar.

Worse than lack of capacity, the incentive of the stockbroker is toward the abuse of his power to extend credit. His temptation is, of course, to ignore the credit position of his customer. He makes first some interest on the money he loans, and then he earns the livelihood by the number and size of his transactions. As long as he has enough to cover during the time needed for him to sell out, he does not care whether the customer must dip into the till to put up more margin or kills himself or loses his home because he can't. It is true he may lose his customer, but he is comforted by Barnum's aphorism. The stock and commodity brokers are the only go-betweens I know of that exercise the credit function. Their stake is not in the use of credit in the interest of the community or its members, but in, naturally, lining their own pockets with as many commissions as possible. They immediately become unable to estimate the wisdom to the particular individual and through him to society of any "credit line."

I have avoided discussing the gambling instinct and its suppression as relates to the stock exchange. We are all of us lazy (except, maybe, Senators) and we would all like to make some money without working for it. We have not been very successful in the legislative suppression of instincts. I am only suggesting that if we want to make money without working for it by operating in the stock market, we should either have the cash in our jeans or we should borrow it from some source which is both more or less expert in the exercise of the credit function and which has no bias in favor of exercising rather than refusal. Such a source manifestly exists in the banking system, which, whatever its past mistakes, must have a vital interest in the economic wisdom of all of us and must govern their loans by an honest desire to build up the country rather than by the wish to have a new crop of the "something-for-nothing boys" every few years.

I have also not dwelt upon the fatal effects of the abuse of credit by the stockbrokers on our whole economic life. To do so seems hardly necessary after what we have just been through. A people can scarcely base its investment policy on borrowing to buy stocks whose value arises principally because everyone is borrowing to buy them and benefit by it. We have sown margin trading and are now reaping the depletion.

I hope I have not been presumptuous, gentlemen. I have seen with my own eyes what margin trading has done to its victims. It has not been a pleasant sight. I hope that the Congress will have the courage and wisdom to put an end to it. May I close with two warnings? First, the stock-exchange authorities have attempted to arouse the country to some chimera of the nationalization of industry. Very patriotic, if true, but let me assure you that the real interest lies in the margin provision, because that's where the money is. Second, they are professing great concern for the small investor, as they euphemistically term him. I even read that your committee was contemplating modifying the margin requirements for his protection. The word should have been "destruction." The interest of the stock exchange in him after what has happened reminds me of the interest of a much older wolf than the big bad one in a little girl with a certain colored hood.

INVESTIGATION OF STOCK EXCHANGES—ARTICLE BY SENATOR FLETCHER

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in Liberty for March 17, 1934, the able senior Senator from Florida, Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, has strikingly reviewed and summarized certain developments of the continuing stock-exchange investigation.

I ask unanimous consent to have Senator FLETCHER's article incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Liberty, Mar. 17, 1934]

OUR FINANCIAL RACKETEERS

(By Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Banking and Currency)

For approximately 20 months the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency has been conducting an investigation into stock-exchange and banking practices. The facts brought out in the public hearings are of such vital importance to the proper conduct of our financial institutions that they cannot be ignored, and we must not permit them to be glossed over. For a final array of the facts and an ultimate appraisal of their values, it is best that we await the conclusion of the hearings and the report of the committee and its counsel; for immediately ahead of us, I believe, is some of the most valuable information which the committee shall be privileged to present. In the meantime it is not inappropriate that we review briefly the developments to date.

Similar investigations have revealed practices just as startling as the present. Unfortunately, however, we seem not to have profited as greatly from the fund of knowledge developed as we should have. My primary purpose in discussing these matters at this time arises from the firm resolution that we shall be neither intimidated, misdirected, nor lulled into a false sense of security. The discreditable, unethical, vicious practices uncovered in this investigation must, insofar as legislatively and administratively possible, be eliminated from the practices of those individuals and institutions controlling the most vital factors of our economic system.

The present investigation had its inception in Senate Resolution No. 84 in April 1932. Its scope was such as to confer upon the committee powers generally believed to permit them to investigate stock-exchange and banking practices, and the desirability of the exercise of the taxing power of the United States with respect to any such securities. Subsequently, Senate Joint Resolution No. 206, Senate Resolutions Nos. 239, 371, 373, and 56 were passed to strengthen and continue the powers of the committee. Early in the life of the Seventy-third Congress a minor crisis developed when the powers of the committee were challenged while it was attempting to investigate individual transactions for income-tax purposes. The Senate responded by passing Senate Resolution No. 97, which contributed in bestowing upon this committee probably the broadest authority ever conferred by Congress on any similar grouping of its Members.

It would be premature to even outline the report and the conclusions of the committee. It is possible now to state only generally the principal subjects studied and enumerate some of the questions which have been investigated and to indicate the scope of the evidence on these matters which point to immediately needed reforms.

The evidence thus far has established beyond question that there have been grave abuses, the continuance of which must not be condoned. In fact, if confidence is to be restored, the general public must be given to understand that such abuses will not be tolerated. The restoration of confidence needed goes further than the mere scope of individual and corporate transactions and practices. The need extends even unto that of State and Federal Government. This committee has been charged with dragging out skeletons, muckraking, and even the destruction of confidence. From the mass of correspondence which has flooded this committee, however, in my estimation the committee's most constructive work is to be found in the revelation of facts and the bolstering of public confidence. The result has been that the financial leaders and institutions of the past have found that the public has more confidence in the committee and governmental bodies in general, and more hope in the protection of corrective legislation and administrative supervision than it has had in them.

Men in high places have betrayed their trust. In theory the corporation official, whether in a bank or other corporate capacity, is a trustee of other people's money. Investigation shows that this feeling of trusteeship has come to be very rare in financial circles.

The acts of financial crooks and racketeers make it plain that efforts must be made to safeguard legitimate depositors and investors. Manipulation and rigging of markets have been shown, though the intents, purposes, and ill effects are either denied or condoned.

Banking and investment corporations have been pyramided and affiliates acquired without rhyme or reason other than to serve selfish interests.

Bankers have become at one and the same time private bankers, commercial bankers, investment bankers, owners or trustees and wreckers of railroads, tunnels, skyscrapers, motion-picture enterprises, public utilities, industrial corporations; public defenders in rallying their banks in united support of a collapsing market on the one hand and selling it short (on margin) on the other. They have, as in the spring and summer of 1929, so the testimony reveals, availed themselves of the rediscount privilege and thrown hundreds of millions of dollars into the call-loan money market in defiance of the belatedly aroused Federal Reserve Board. They have supported the market until their syndicate and pool operations were completed, then withdrawn their support, sold the market short (on margin)—even the stock of their own banks and corporations. To the extent that these latter practices prevailed, these individuals and corporations dictated and controlled the monetary policy of this Nation—even that of the world—according to the interests of a private purpose in lieu of a public purpose. The heavy toll upon the Nation of the ensuing debacle is evidenced in part of the loss of $4,000,000,000 per month in national income.

Giant banking superstructures, such as those organized in the Detroit area, coerced the management of unit banks, organized pools and trading accounts for market operations, padded their assets, falsified their statements to the general public, and declared huge unearned dividends as a matter of policy in order to bolster public confidence and cover up their unsound condition.

To climax these operations, we must add, the investment departments of our commercial banks have accepted funds from trusting clients and placed them in securities of which they and their affiliates were the sponsors.

In the light of these facts the National and State banking holidays are a mere matter of arrested developments. There is strong evidence that, under the cloak of dollar diplomacy, our big commercial bankers have stuffed the portfolios of their small interior correspondents with worthless foreign securities, as well as flooded the country generally; that they have employed sons of the presidents of borrowing nations while negotiating loans and underwriting flotations, salvaged their own loans while misrepresenting the facts in their underwriting statements, and become recreant in demanding that sinking funds be maintained for the protection of the American investing public. They have not hesitated at misinforming the public with respect to the financial condition of the foreign governments and corporations whose securities they were floating; nor have they hesitated to become construction contractors making successful bids on projects they have sponsored in order to reap added private gains. Finally, the Department of State has been shown to have dangerously approached the point of passing on the merit of foreign securities.

Heretofore we had been told that little bankers were incompetent operators of holes in the wall. Now events seem to show that in many instances even big bankers cannot be entirely trusted to handle other people's money without rigid supervision.

Huge deals running into the millions are noted only in the minds or on confidential memoranda, not in the minute books of banks and corporations. Probably never are these facts and underlying purposes revealed to stockholders, to whom these men should be accountable, nor are they made known to the general public when floating security issues.

We are often led to believe from the testimony that the recipients of large salaries, fees, bonuses, and commissions spend the greater part of their time either spending their income and organizing personal corporations for tax purposes or running or participating in pools, syndicates, trading accounts, etc., to support the market.

Holes in existing laws have been exposed, calling for their prompt plugging. The sieve-like character of the income tax laws has been revealed.

On the other hand, the lack of regulatory legislation has consigned lawless banking to the banker's code of ethics, according to which bankers apportion the field into noncompetitive areas, as was, for instance, testified to in railroad financing. This same practice over in the commercial field may likewise be made to serve their purpose by restricting credit alternatives with the ultimate capture, even destruction, of profitable and legitimate enterprises, to the detriment of security holders and the general public.

Ethics may be better than law, but who has the temerity to teach a higher code to some bankers?

Elsewhere I have dealt with the provisions of the Banking Act of 1933. Here it suffices if I call attention only to the fact that the above act provides for the separation of the securities affiliates from commercial banking, contains restrictions against the making of loans for speculative purposes, eliminates interest on demand deposits, and lastly has set into motion Federal machinery for the insurance of bank deposits. This latter provision, in my estimation, is the most valuable contribution of the act and will necessitate a far more thorough and rigid examination of commercial banking than we have ever had. As a direct result of this supervision, I expect many of the abuses and malpractices of former banking to be done away with.

Some of the facts brought out by the committee with respect to income taxes are fantastic. One multimillionaire has paid no income taxes in the United States for 3 years, even though he paid income taxes in England. This, he pointed out, was due to the difference between the British and the American laws. Another avoided income taxes by selling securities to his daughter at a lower price than they cost him. She was not at the time aware of the fact that she had become the purchaser. Not a cent of money passed in the transaction. A little later, on the same terms, these same securities were put back in the father's name.

Still another, as I recall, went into the tax-avoidance business on a wholesale scale. He organized 3 American and 3 Canadian corporations. Through a circuitous route he helped them legally avoid payment of taxes to the United States Treasury, despite the fact that he later covered these funds into one corporation. In addition, we found these corporations financing and functioning in a wider capacity in the investment, banking, and stock-speculation fields.

Another individual, through the creation of living trusts for members of his family—managed by himself—together with transactions for both his and their account, was able to sell the market short in one account, borrow from another on the note of the first, carry for years a short position with a tremendous potential profit, suspend the payment of taxes, and stand the chance in the end of avoiding them entirely. Others executed similar transactions between themselves and their wives, with substantially the same results as that between daughter and father.

The fallacy of the law lies in its treating speculative gains and losses on a basis of equality with legitimate profits and losses. One is lost or gained by gambling in the wares of stock and commodity exchanges, whereas the other must be put in the category of legitimate profits and losses of capital assets and legitimate income. To me it is inconceivable that capital arbitrarily shrinks in December and recovers its attractiveness at the end of an arbitrarily fixed, subsequent 60- or 90-day period. In my estimation such transactions are a gambling connivance, entered into for the deliberate legal avoidance of taxes, economically and socially vicious in their effects; the losses of which should be neither cushioned nor compensated for by the Government taxing policies. The gain from such transactions should at least be appropriated to the same extent as are legitimate transactions, if not further penalized. Such transactions are wholly vicious and should be exterminated.

Bear raiding and bulling the market are advocated as a corrective purgative. It is common knowledge, however, that during the boom years of 1928 and 1929 the quoted prices of securities were almost incredible. Testimony before this committee reveals both the why and the how. The why is found in the enormous profits garnered by operators in the market. The how is arrived at by viewing the parade of pools, syndicates, trading accounts, etc., testified to by participants called before this committee. These individuals, working mostly under cover of secrecy, aided through campaigns of the most vicious type of misrepresentation and misinformation, and aided through being able to work with other people's money, manipulated the market up and down until the prices of securities reached on the exchange bore no discoverable relation to the value of the properties represented. The market was churned, supported, stabilized, depressed, revived, sagged, recovered in the course of developing a speculative mania.

Whereas the existence of such operations had been denied by officials of the New York Stock Exchange, subsequent testimony before this committee has established the fact that all these types of transactions were indulged in by individuals both off and having membership on the exchange. Even specialists on the floor managed trading accounts, pools, etc., in the very stocks for which they were acting as specialists.

Since the passage of the Securities Act the business of underwriting securities does not look so attractive as it did to many of the fiscal agents. The reason is that the security holders, prospective security holders, the general public, and the Government must know the facts—the truth. Above all they must know who gets the money and upon what terms he gets it.

The Securities Act was designed to protect the public from paying $52 per share for 20-cent stock as a result of misinformation. Knowing the facts, it may, if it wishes, pay from $50 to $75 per share for 20-cent stock, or condone preferred lists. Nevertheless, it must have the facts in advance of its commitment. There will be no difficulty experienced in raising long-time funds on the part of legitimate enterprises which are guided by honesty and good faith. At the present time there is reason to believe that industry has been amply, even extravagantly financed. The trouble now, in part at least, even if it exists at all, is to find new industries offering safe and sound investment opportunities justifying credit.

To stockholders of those existing corporations alleged to be in need of new financing or refinancing, whose present officials and directors have refused to authorize such financing, my advice is: Get a new set of officers and directors who will state and subscribe to the facts.

Opponents of the Securities Act really wish to be left free to do as they have done in the past. They magnify penalties—as if the act would be worth anything without the penalties! They quail at the liability imposed. They seem to like scenic directors.

The attention of Government and of the general public must focus on worthless short selling, as it presently will assume alarming proportions.

In my opinion, Congress has ample legislative power, and a correlative duty to exercise that power, for the passage of proper regulatory stock-exchange legislation. The line of demarcation between stock-exchange regulations and that of the recently enacted Securities Act is relatively indistinct. For this reason I am not clear in my own mind just how close together the administration of these two pieces of legislation should be.

I am of the firm conviction, however, that some permanent body should be created with which all pertinent stock-exchange information should be filed, either directly or subject to its call, particularly the compulsory registration of all pools, syndicates, trading accounts, etc., together with the names of all participants and subparticipants, as well as a weekly report of the activities in behalf of such accounts.

To point out some of the possible correctives:

First of all, I suggest that the monetary policy of this Nation be administered by the Federal Government wholly independent of the control of speculators, bankers, and all vested interests. The sound recovery for which all constructive interests and interested persons are striving is a more substantial and healthier recovery than that which can be produced as a result of frenzied finance. An increased demand for products and services and sound securities is needed. Misinformation, rigging the market, and other customary practices of the past must not be tolerated.

Officials and directors ought to be prohibited by law from dealing in the securities of the corporation with which they are connected or affiliated. This kind of thing in the past has been scandalous, morally wrong, and injurious to the proper marketing or handling of securities. The broker can do comparatively little without the protection of bank or company officials who either control the supply of securities or the funds to create the demand for them. The broker acts on orders.

I believe there should be legislation requiring every company, corporation, or association to have its transfer books open to every qualified stockholder, so that should any stockholder want to know who his associates or partners in the business are he could obtain a full or partial list. The average stockholder knows practically nothing of what is going on and has no way of expressing his views to his fellow stockholders.

SUPPRESSION OF ILLEGAL NARCOTIC TRAFFIC—ADDRESS BY CHARLES H. SHERRILL

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address broadcast February 24, 1934, by Hon. Charles H. Sherrill, former Ambassador to Turkey, which treats of the crusade against the illegal narcotic traffic by Mustafa Kemal.

I am sure my colleagues will be impressed with the gigantic strides Mustafa Kemal has made in transforming his nation from a once flagrant violator of narcotic-control agreements into a consistent adherent to the policy of narcotic control and suppression.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Never before in the history of the world have the people developed such a wide demand for leaders, and never has that demand been met with fine leaders in so many countries. To prove this, one has only to mention Mussolini in Italy, Pilsudski in Poland, Horthy in Hungary, Mustafa Kemal in Turkey, and Gomez, the leader who recently paid off the entire foreign debt of Venezuela. And furthermore, never have such outstanding statesmen received more general support from their own people, and that too without implying their complete approval of the measures selected by those leaders to improve their people's conditions. And what about America? I am a Republican who has just returned from a stay in Washington, and the impression I bring away of my visit there is that the Democratic Party men at the Capital do not realize how widely the 16,000,000 Republicans who voted against Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 are now doing their best to back his gallant efforts to bring the country out of the crisis. Yes; America today widely respects the vigorous attempts of our Chief Executive, just as all over Europe the people are also supporting their leaders in the same course and for the same reason.

There is one very great cause which affords grounds for a great and noble crusade, and this is the overcoming of that scourge of mankind, the narcotics evil. That crusade deserves leadership of the very best sort, from men who will not only be followed by their own people at home but also who will deserve and earn international following. It is my purpose and privilege today to tell you of one of such leaders, Mustafa Kemal, President of the new Turkish Republic, a government which he created a decade ago out of the wreck of the old Ottoman Empire. He is not so well known in this country as he deserves nor as he is certain to be later on. It is both appropriate and useful that I tell you about him today, appropriate because he himself took such a magnificent step forward when Christmas Day 1932 he abolished opium manufacture in Turkey—and useful, because the details of that move of his show us how this crusade can be pushed in other lands without the danger to local agricultural and other interests so often insidiously alleged against our crusade by its clever opponents.

Just how great a statesman is this outstanding Turkish gentleman? When Litvinoff was recently in Washington, completing one of the most striking diplomatic triumphs of recent years, the gaining of recognition of the American Government for the Soviet regime in Russia, he was asked who, in his opinion, is the greatest statesman today in Europe. He made the picturesque reply, "The greatest European statesman today does not live in Europe—he lives across the straits in Turkey. His name is Mustafa Kemal." During 1932 and 1933 I had the honor to be the American Ambassador to Turkey, and, thanks to a biography of him which I was writing, was enabled to study him and his career in most advantageous fashion. I concur most heartily in the brainy Russian's characterization of that eminent Turk. Where else in Europe is there a statesman sufficiently far-sighted to make the decision Mustafa Kemal made after his complete defeat in 1922 of the Greek invasion of Turkey. He decided that exaction of war reparations from Greece was far less desirable than encouragement of cordial relations between the two nations, sure to lead to increase of commercial relations between them profitable to both sides. Furthermore, he felt that the payment of any such reparations so exacted by the victor would almost certainly be later on interrupted by the vanquished and in such manner as to arouse bad feeling between the parties destructive to any commercial advantage to either. I repeat, where in Europe is there, or, since the World War, has there been a statesman so far-seeing as this reveals the leader of the new re-Turkified Turkey?

And now let us see just how he effected the world-startling change in Turkey's attitude toward the manufacture of opium, in which she theretofore had so considerable a part. His action will help us to suggest similar ones by other nations. Study of reports on the world's opium trade such as those published by the narcotics section of the League of Nations at Geneva, or the Narcotics Bureau of our own Treasury Department, will show that Turkey was almost the worst offender in serving as a base for the illicit trade in opium. How great an offender appears from the fact that soon after Mustafa Kemal's gallant decision for Turkey at Christmas 1932 the price of opium increased many times in the United States. That increase proved clearly where the drug had been illicitly coming from.

One hears that only the week before that Christmas Day did he learn both of the rapidly increasing totals of arrests in Turkey for unauthorized sales of narcotics, but also of how Turkey's seemingly tolerant attitude toward that illicit trade was being viewed by the outside world. So distinguished a soldier as he doubtless saw at once the evil effects upon the Turkish youth, from which came his army's recruits, that spread of narcotic use would surely effect. But the president of a country 84 percent of whose citizens were engaged in agriculture must also have sensed what cruel damage the suppression of their innocent cultivation of the opium poppy and of Indian hemp (basis of hashish) would cause. Crusades must be destructive of evil, but should not be destructive of innocent farmers. What did he do? He unhesitatingly declared for the suppression of poppy and Indian hemp culture, but at the same time advising the Turkish farmers to substitute therefor the growth of sugar beets, the Government aiding therein by erection at strategic points of sugar refineries best situated to purchase those beets from local farmers and refine the sugar therefrom. Thus another far-seeing fact was linked up with that move, for thus would Turkey be supplied by her own people with the sugar she was then importing from abroad. After two prolonged cabinet sessions, at which the nation's chief executive himself presided, instead of its usual presiding officer, there was broadcasted to the world late that Christmas Day one of the most beneficent Christmas presents the world has ever received. Turkey was removed from the world picture as a great opium-producing country and base for illicit trade therein. She cast her vote in favor of the League of Nations' 1931 Opium Convention, so that when the vote, a very close one, was counted on the final day, April 13, 1933, it was found that this splendid project had been ratified. One hears that when the following month delegates from all the fifty-odd countries convened at Geneva, the Turkish delegate was overwhelmed with congratulatory speeches from one after another of the delegates all eager to express admiration for this magnificent leadership of Turkey's President, Mustafa Kemal.

Official expression of America's reaction to the world-wide impression caused by this move of the Gazi's was voiced in the United States Senate by Senator JAMES J. DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 3, 1933, as follows:

"The world, and especially America, received this magnificent Christmas gift in the form of a ban on that day of the narcotic trade by President Mustafa Kemal, of Turkey. He presided over a cabinet meeting that closed the narcotic factories of Constantinople, and is limiting the poppy cultivation to meet medicinal opium needs. This makes the President of Turkey one of the outstanding leaders in the international narcotic war.

"This action is particularly significant to the United States, because in the past 2 years the unfortunate victims of this traffic in the United States have been entirely supplied from drugs which were the output of the three factories closed by the President of Turkey."

And how was the League of Nations, sitting at Geneva, impressed by the Gazi's splendid decision? That question is best answered by the following excerpt from the report it received from its own opium advisory committee to the League Council meeting held May 15 to 31, 1934:

"The committee took advantage of the presence of the representative of Turkey to express to him unanimously its great appreciation for the accession of Turkey to the conventions of 1912, 1925, and 1931 and for the measures taken by the Government in connection with the control of the cultivation of the poppy, the exportation of raw opium, the manufacture of narcotic drugs, and the prohibition of the cultivation of Indian hemp. It expressed also its appreciation of the increased activity recently displayed by the Turkish authorities in the suppression of clandestine manufacture of drugs at Istanbul."

Now that this crusade has earned and gained such splendid leadership at the very top, among the chief executives of so many nations, it behooves the rest of us more modest folk to exhibit the same high grade of leadership. We are told by those charged with the execution of antinarcotic laws that the first thing for us to achieve in this country is uniform State laws on the subject, and then more stringent municipal ordinances for our cities. I am glad to report to you that our New York State Chamber of Commerce has appointed a special committee on narcotics in order to work through our sister chambers of commerce in other States and cities for that very uniformity of laws and also municipal ordinances. A chamber is effectively strong if it succeeds in enlisting public opinion in its efforts on behalf of the people. For that reason we bespeak the good will and cooperation of all those who hear this broadcast in this particular endeavor of ours in this, our and your crusade, against the use of narcotics, the most insidious evil now menacing our body politic.

UNIONIZATION OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Parting of the Ways", which appeared in the Ashland (Ky.) Daily Independent of March 21, 1934.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Ashland (Ky.) Daily Independent, Mar. 21, 1934]

A PARTING OF THE WAYS

These are perilous times in American industry and American life.

The process of recovery has so far taken place because of the cooperation of both capital and labor to that end. So long as a balance was kept by give-and-take, mutual sacrifice and mutual cooperation, this has continued.

Now the American Federation of Labor attempts to leap into the saddle forcibly with a demand for complete union control of the Nation's busiest industry. The alternative is a strike of vast proportions that would tie up the one business that has led the way toward recovery in the last 4 months.

Hundreds of thousands of satisfied workmen, who desire only to be left alone to support their families, do their work, and enjoy life, would thus be thrown out of employment. The effects of the strike would be felt by millions of people employed in dozens of industries. This includes steel, the continued production of which is so vital to recovery here in Ashland.

The point at issue is not one of hours, nor of wages, but of ultimate control of the industry itself. The American Federation of Labor insists upon complete unionization of the automobile business, with a general strike as the alternative. The automobile manufacturers refuse to yield control of the business which they have built and developed to paid union executives who did not build nor develop it.

On the top of this danger is the threat of the Wagner bill in the Senate, which would make unionization imperative in all American industry. This would be done by legislative mandate and would force the country's 40,000,000 workers into union membership whether they desired it or not.

Just at a time when recovery seemed to be an accomplished fact the leaders of the American Federation of Labor decide to get all the workers of the Nation into their paying membership, or to tear down the whole fabric of recovery with general strikes if their demands are not met. Further to cinch their absolute rule over the Nation's industry, they seek to force through Congress the Wagner bill, which would legalize and perpetuate their control.

The Nation has gone along with the new deal and accepted and adopted with zeal many principles and formulas, emanating from the halls of Columbia University and totally foreign to American ideals of freedom, without question or quibble. But unless the swing to communism is halted somewhere within the range of reasonable ideas of justice and liberty the Nation itself will balk. We are not ready for a dictatorship of radical and self-seeking walking delegates any more than we were willing to stand for a dictatorship of the power of wealth and entrenched privilege, such as brought us to our fall 4 years ago.

Fair hours to admit a maximum of employment, fair compensation for labor to give all a living wage with something over, the right of workers to bargain collectively, the elimination of cut-throat competition, all these are worthy ends, at least partially achieved. Complete dictatorship over privately owned industry by the American Federation of Labor is another thing entirely. Its leaders did not build it and are not equipped to rule it, either by training or by ability.

If our Senators and Representatives are wise, they will defeat the Wagner bill in spite of all pressure. It provides for worse than communism. Its provisions are the antithesis of Americanism.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, Senators in charge of the conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill are not ready at this juncture to proceed; so I suggest that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the objective sought by this bill has been under consideration for several years. The first bill introduced by me when I came to the Senate, shortly after I arrived here, was based upon the same principle contained in this bill. On two previous occasions I addressed the Senate on the principle of this bill.

I mention those facts to indicate that this is not a hurriedly prepared program, but is one that has grown out of long consideration and thorough discussion through all sections of the Cotton Belt, especially during the past 12 months.

The object sought to be accomplished by this bill is to make definite and certain a reduction in the present abnormal and price-depressing surplus or carry-over of cotton. We are seeking, if possible, to bring the price of our money commodity—practically the only money commodity produced in the South—to a fair exchange value with other commodities. The fair exchange value or parity at present would be about 15 cents a pound.

I think it is recognized by all students that the largest factor in the price of any commodity is the relation of the supply to the effective demand of the market for that commodity. So long as we have a carry-over which approaches the one now on the markets, it will be impossible, under all well-recognized trade laws, to bring about a fair exchange price for cotton.

At present the carry-over of cotton is nearly 12,000,000 bales. The world consumption of American cotton for 1931 and 1932 averaged a little under 12,000,000 bales. Our surplus of cotton last year reached the staggering figure of 13,000,000 bales. In fact, there was in the warehouses of the spinners of the world and the cotton merchants a supply of cotton sufficient to supply the entire consumptive demands for American cotton for a full year if not a single stalk of cotton had been produced.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACK in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Gladly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Do I understand that this enormous surplus results in spite of the plow-under campaign?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will come to that, Mr. President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to come to that.

The pre-war period of 1909 to 1914 is generally accepted by economists as presenting the best period representing a fair exchange value of all commodities, industrial and agricultural.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in the figures the Senator gives; but he always couples them with the qualification that they represent the American supply. How much of the cotton used by the world is produced outside the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. America produces about 54 percent of the world's supply of cotton.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in that connection what is the relation between domestic consumption and export cotton?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We consume in this country about 40 percent of the American production. We look to foreign markets for the sale of about 60 percent of our entire cotton production.

During the pre-war period—which, as I have just stated, represents the best period of fair exchange prices—the average carry-over for the 5 years involved in that period was 3,132,000 bales. Since that time, as Senators will observe, that carry-over went up to 13,000,000 bales last year, and now is 11,750,000 bales.

I have here a table, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD, showing the carry-over of American cotton from 1928 to 1933. I ask to have it printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Carry-over Aug. 1

Pre-war	3,132,000
1928-29	5,206,000
1929-30	4,517,000
1930-31	6,187,000
1931-32	8,919,000
1932-33	13,228,000
1933-34	11,754,000
Average production	15,155,000
Consumption 1929, 1930, and 1931	12,213,000

Mr. BANKHEAD. In 1929, 1930, and 1931 the average production of American cotton was 15,155,000 bales. The average consumption for the same period was 12,213,000 bales. In other words, for 3 years the average production each year was nearly 3,000,000 bales more than the average consumption of cotton. That accounts for the very large surplus that has prevailed since 1931, increasing in 1932 to 13,000,000 bales, and now is still nearly 12,000,000.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—and I am glad to have any questions on this subject which occur to the minds of Senators seeking information—inquired if this surplus continued notwithstanding the plow-up campaign. The plow-up campaign did not bring about the amount of reduction that its advocates hoped for. The actual production after the plow-up campaign was practically the same as it was the year before, 13,000,000 bales.

That crop, however, as is recognized everywhere in the South, was the result of the most ideal weather conditions, almost, in the recollection of the oldest people of the South. It is now known, may I say to the Senator from Michigan, that if we had not had the plow-up campaign, our surplus would have been increased by four and a half million bales of cotton.

In short, while we did not get the relief for which we hoped by reason of weather conditions, we did get relief in a way that absolutely saved the situation in the South. With a 17,600,000-bale crop, which would have been produced but for the plow-up campaign, we would have been here today confronted with a carry-over not of 12,000,000 bales but of approximately 17,500,000 bales; and if we could have sold that seventeen and a half million bales at all last year, with a 13,000,000-bale carry-over, we would have sold it at 3 or 4 cents a pound.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Gladly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is the matter in which I am interested, and I know the Senator can illuminate the subject:

We paid enormous benefits to these cotton planters in the expectation of a good-faith effort to reduce the acreage by one third through this program. What I desire to know is whether or not it is possible to have a program of that character actually developed in good faith; and my question is addressed to this proposition, if the Senator will permit me.

I read a statement somewhere that the Southern Railway had declared that during the last crop season it carried four times as much fertilizer in the Southern States as ever before; and I was wondering if that disclosed the fact that the moment the total acreage was reduced there was an intensified production on the remaining acreage.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very glad, indeed, to deal in perfect frankness with the Senator on that subject. I think the Senator will recognize that it is human nature, it is inherent in all of us, to deal as best we can with our own personal problems without violating an express contract.

It appears that around 90 percent of those formerly producing cotton have entered into acreage-reduction contracts. Those of us who are familiar with the situation know that the farmers will reduce their acreage, because it necessarily will be policed; but that phase of the program will be carried out in perfect good faith by those who have entered into the contract. We have no sort of doubt about that. We recognize that in good faith they plowed up their acreage last year, and we are sure that those who signed the contracts this year will limit their planting to the number of acres retained by them under the contracts. But notwithstanding the most perfect good faith in the matter of the number of acres planted to cotton, I know, and others know, that each farmer on his 6 acres out of 10 is doing everything he knows how to do to grow as much cotton on his particular 6 acres of land as was grown last year and in prior years on the 10 acres of land. That is a situation which no one can control; it is a situation which does not violate the letter of any contract. That is the situation, may I say to the Senator, which makes the adoption of a baleage limitation, in addition to the acreage reduction, absolutely essential if we are to secure relief in the matter of reducing our enormous surplus of cotton.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am frank to say that I am not very familiar with the bill, having read it only last night, but as I understand, the bill deals alone with the question of cotton baleage; it does not undertake to deal with acreage?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. An individual may raise the cotton if he desires, but he is limited to selling only so much?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Then this bill has for its purpose really, for want of a better term, coercing the minority who have not signed the acreage-reduction contracts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that it is not limited to those who have not signed up on the acreage-reduction proposition. The cooperating and the noncooperating farmers get an allotment on exactly the same basis. I have taken the position all along that even if 100 percent had signed the acreage-reduction contracts, this bill would be an absolute necessity in order to bring about, assuming average weather, a definite and certain reduction in the surplus of cotton.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen a statement—in fact, it came to me in a letter from the South—that this would likely lead to production, although the producer could not sell; that it would enable speculators, those who would be in a position to hold the cotton, to control the surplus.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How would the speculators get it if the producer could not sell it?

Mr. BORAH. He could sell it to the speculators, could he not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If he could sell to the speculators, he could sell to the market. But under this bill the only way he could sell his cotton would be by paying his tax on it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. It would apply to that part of the cotton which enters into interstate commerce. That part of the baled cotton which is deposited in warehouses could be sold without the payment of any tax, and remain there, until the expiration of the period provided in the law, or the failure of the law. Is not that true?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This proposed legislation is not based on the principle contained in the original bill which I introduced and with which the Senator is familiar. The original bill, introduced by me 2 or 3 years ago, and which the Senator heard me discuss here, was based solely on the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and it was to avoid undue burdens on it. It required a license based upon the quantity of cotton going into interstate commerce. This bill is along entirely different lines and is based upon the same principle underlying the oleomargarine law, with which the Senator is familiar, and which he so long supported; that is, the imposition of a tax upon cotton, with certain exemptions justified under the income tax law, and all other decisions on the subject of taxes permitting exemptions.

Mr. McNARY. I understand the Senator's statement as applied to this particular situation. He says now the production would be limited to 10,000,000 bales in the crop year 1934-35. Ten million bales is the total number that may enter interstate commerce.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not make any difference whether they enter interstate commerce or not.

Mr. McNARY. The balance in excess of 10,000,000 bales may enter interstate commerce, but must pay a prohibitive tax, namely, 50 percent of its value, in no case less than 5 cents a pound. So there is an inhibition against the free movement of cotton in excess of the quantity which it is specified by this bill should be raised, namely, 10,000,000 bales.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly what I am driving at.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator may be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to limit it to 10,000,000 bales, and, if I had my way, I would make it 9,000,000. I think 10,000,000 is entirely too much.

Mr. McNARY. I was trying to travel in a more direct route in order to answer the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Idaho. A speculator, an investor, could acquire stored cotton, which does not move in interstate commerce, and hold it there until the expiration of the proposed law, or the exposure of any fallacy it may contain, and then he could obtain the advantage of the purchase. That is the proposition made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me say, in answer to the Senator, that, in the first place, the speculator could not acquire the cotton without paying the tax because the tax must be paid before the cotton can be sold or transported in any way under the provisions of the bill. Then why would there be any profit in the program for the speculator in buying, except such buying as speculators do in the normal and usual course of business, when no such measure as this is upon the statute books?

In the second place, let me ask the Senator this question. If there may be a million or so bales of cotton upon which some speculator, or a number of speculators, might make some profit after paying the tax, I want to ask the Senator whether for that reason he would be willing to penalize all of the cotton producers in the South, when their very life and the destiny of the whole section depend upon a fair price for the 10,000,000 bales of cotton?

If the Senator is so anxious that those speculators shall not make a profit, after paying the tax fixed by the law, that he is willing to leave this terrible burden upon the price of cotton and make it almost impossible, as we believe, for the farmers to get a fair price for the 10,000,000 bales of cotton, then I must admit that I cannot follow his philosophy.

We are working here for the good of the great masses of the people in that great section, and I am sure that no one is going to be deterred from that great objective by a suggestion that a speculator might make a little profit here and there.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am not interested in speculators. I was trying to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Idaho. What I want to know—and I am asking the question good naturedly and in order to get the expression of the Senator—is whether he means by this bill to supplement the law which involves the removal of excess acreage under the A.A.A. Last year, according to a statement I have from the Department of Agriculture, 10,000,000 acres were removed from production, which caused the price level of cotton to be raised from about 4 cents to an average of about 9 cents. A hundred million dollars was paid to the cotton producers of the South as benefits under that law, with 100-percent increase in price level, with a 25-percent decrease in acreage.

This year they contemplate a decrease in the acreage of 5,000,000 acres more, making 15,000,000 acres, and it is thought that the price level will probably advance 4 or 5 cents a pound, with increased benefits in the South amounting to $135,000,000, according to the estimate of the Department of Agriculture. I thought—and I will say to my friend from Alabama—that when we passed the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Act last spring it was thought by the committee—and by the Congress—that it would give the cotton man all the benefits he desired, and those benefits he has been receiving have been reflected in a higher price level and a hundred million dollars in direct cash benefits. Now, I am asking the Senator whether he is dissatisfied with that effort on the part of Congress, and whether he means, by compulsion, to supplement that act by his own measure, which will force production to be limited to 10,000,000 bales, irrespective of the processing tax and the voluntary character of the present statute?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Senator's question answers itself when he sees me here advocating this bill. Why is he asking the question?

Mr. McNARY. I think I can answer it, and I think I have done so. Is it the desire of the Senator and is it his opinion that Congress should take this other step in addition to that which has been taken and place a law back of the Federal Government compelling a majority of the owners, or two thirds of the owners, irrespective of their views, to meet the requirements of his bill? Is that the purpose of the Senator?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to limit the number of bales that may be sold in the market free from the payment of tax. As I have endeavored to explain in answer to the question of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], we recognize that an acreage reduction of cotton does not assure and guarantee a reduction of the number of units to come from that crop. It may be difficult for Senators from other sections of the country to realize that situation as we do, because their agricultural crops do not vary so much in the amount of production as does cotton, as a result of intensive cultivation, and the use of high-grade and high-priced fertilizer, or any other kind of fertilizer.

We in the South recognize, may I say to the Senator, that in the matter of cotton, as I stated a while ago, assuming the same weather conditions, by intensive cultivation, by placing the rows closer together and using more fertilizer, as now is being planned to be done in many sections, by retention of the best cotton acreage in the 60 percent retained by the cotton growers, and other methods of that kind, that we will not get, with any definiteness and any certainty, the reduction that the statistical position of cotton demands, and for that reason we are seeking here to put into legal effect and legal operation the implied agreements of the farmers who have reduced their acreage by 40 percent of their acreage under their agreement with the Government.

The theory of the cotton-reduction contract is that there will be a reduction of 40 percent in cotton production. The grower will use 60 percent of the land used over the previous 5-year average, because that is his acreage arrangement. We are by this bill proposing that the grower's reduction to 60 percent shall also apply to the number of bales that he shall sell in the market this year.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACK in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator, speaking of the legal proposition involved, does not rely upon the interstate-commerce clause for full authority for the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. President; I do not. I rely upon the taxing power. I think the interstate-commerce clause helps it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the Senator does propose to deal with cotton which never enters into interstate commerce?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; with respect to the tax.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me at that point, that practically all cotton, or its manufactured products, moves into interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the Senator is not relying upon the interstate-commerce clause?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not entirely; no. I said I thought it added strength.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. But the Senator is using the taxing power for the purpose of reducing the amount of cotton which may go into the market?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It will have that effect.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the Senator is seeking to accomplish?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; exactly. Exactly the same as the oleomargarine tax which was imposed upon that product.

Mr. BORAH. I cannot quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Idaho is a frank man and familiar with that question. I will ask him, why was it imposed?

Mr. BORAH. The taxing power with reference to oleomargarine, in my judgment, went to the very limit; but here—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say, Mr. President, its purpose was to limit the amount and almost prohibit, if possible, the amount moving in interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. No; the question of deception in that case entered into the question. The question was that of fraud.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the legal question; that was the justification legally for the act, but what was the purpose of the advocates of the oleomargarine act? I am getting at the purpose of it. I know the Senator from Idaho is a frank man.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho did not support the oleomargarine act, so he is not defending it. But I think it clearly distinguishes oleo from the proposition here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator was here and knows the purpose of the advocates of the act.

Mr. BORAH. I am considering the bill now under consideration. I first want to know what the purpose of the bill is. As I understand, the Senator departs from the interstate commerce clause and relies in part upon the taxing power of the Government.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I rely upon both.

Mr. BORAH. And the Senator uses the taxing power for the purpose of reducing the acreage?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not.

Mr. BORAH. For the purpose of reducing the amount of cotton that may come into the market?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; that may be sold in the market free of the tax.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, when the cotton market has received a certain amount of cotton, the Senator then proposes to lay on a tax to prevent any more cotton from entering the market?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We lay a tax on it all, but exempt a certain part of it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We want to be legally accurate while we are discussing the legal phases of it.

Mr. BORAH. We also want to be entirely legally sincere.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. One is the same as the other. I understand, therefore, and I take it that from a legal standpoint the Senator is relying upon the taxing power rather than the interstate commerce clause?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I attach more importance to the taxing power, frankly, yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator attaches more importance to the taxing power.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator then accepts not only the dictum but the philosophy and statement of a great Chief Justice that "the power to tax is the power to destroy", and he wants to destroy the production of cotton by taxation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that question is so absurd that there is no occasion to try to answer it, I will say to the Senator. He is speaking of the case of someone who is trying to destroy, whereas I am trying to build up.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator—if he will pardon me for a further question—his effort is to destroy production above 10,000,000 bales, and destroy it by invoking the taxing power of the Government?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not trying to destroy it. I am trying to discourage people from entering upon the production of it.

Mr. President, this is a serious program from the standpoint of not only the people of the South but of the whole country. Unfortunately, we do not engage in general industrial production, except in a few small centers, in the Cotton Belt. Nearly everything of an industrial character that is consumed in the South is manufactured in the industrial sections of this country. The southern people get no money from outside their section for industrial products. We produce nothing of that character that brings a flow of cash into the Cotton Belt.

I asked the president of the Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co., the greatest industrial unit in all the South, owned by the Steel Corporation, what proportion of all the manufactured products of that great plant at Birmingham was sold outside the Cotton Belt, and through that channel brought money into the Cotton Belt, and to my great surprise he told me that only 15 percent of all their products moved outside the Cotton Belt.

So, when a sufficient amount of money does not move into the great Cotton Belt, our people are unable to patronize the industries which are located in the sections represented by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber.

In 1932 the entire cotton crop brought only $397,000,000.

In 1919 it brought $2,000,000,000.

In 1929, which was the last year before the depression, it brought $1,245,000,000.

Just think of practically the total crop of the great Cotton Belt, reaching from southern Virginia to southern California, having its income reduced from $1,200,000,000 down to less than $400,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. With great sympathy for the Senator's section, may I not inquire whether that is not almost the percentage of the total reduction in the national income during those periods?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the reduction with respect to the price of cotton is a greater proportion of reduction than the average. There are some agricultural commodities in respect to which the reduction of income is as great as in the case of cotton. I desire to say to the Senator from Michigan, however, that as a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture I have stood, and every member of that committee knows that I have stood, with an open willingness to promote any agricultural program for the benefit of agriculture in any section of America that may be agreed upon by those who represent the producers in such agricultural section. My heart is with them. My judgment is with them.

I know, as I am sure the Senator, great man as I recognize him to be, must know, that until we return purchasing and debt-paying power to the great mass of agricultural producers in America, wherever they may be located, we cannot bring a return of prosperity, and we cannot have consumption of the products of industries scattered throughout America.

We have developed a concrete program for cotton, and we are not proposing to raid the Treasury on account of it—and I will come to that directly—but we have developed it as we developed the plow-under campaign, as we developed the 10-percent-loan plan, because we were looking after that particular commodity, for we represented the people who were producing it.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. As I understand, the Senator is in entire sympathy with the acreage-reduction plan as applied to cotton?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. DIETERICH. How does the Senator reconcile that position with section 8 of the pending bill, to which I call attention, and in which it is provided:

Whenever an allotment is made pursuant to section 3, not to exceed 10 percent of the number of bales allotted to each State shall be deducted from the number of bales allotted to such State, and allotted in such State—

(a) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years less than one third of the cultivated land on such farms has been planted to cotton;

(b) To producers of cotton on farms not previously used in cotton production;

(c) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 5 years normal cotton production has been reduced by reason of drought, storm, flood, insect pests, or other uncontrollable natural cause; and

(d) To producers of cotton on farms where for the preceding 3 years acreage theretofore planted to cotton has been voluntarily reduced so that the amount of reduction in cotton production on such farms is greater than the amount which the Secretary finds would have been an equitable reduction applicable to such farms in carrying out a reasonable reduction program.

I will ask the Senator if that is not directly an encouragement to increase acreage for the raising of cotton on lands which were previously taken out of the production of cotton.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will answer the Senator in this way: Section 8, as the Senator will note, does not increase the quantity of cotton production, which is fixed at 10,000,000 bales. It simply sets aside where the administrative officials decide it should be done a percentage of that allotment for other purposes which the Senator has indicated.

Mr. DIETERICH. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, the other purposes are to provide compensation and to bring within the provisions of the proposed act those lands and those classes of farmers who have voluntarily reduced their acreage or whose farms have not been used for the production of cotton.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will read carefully the grounds for the additional allotment he will see that the 10 percent is not an increase in the total cotton production authorized by the bill. A part of that 10 percent is utilized to remedy inequitable conditions, such as where there has been drought, where there has been devastation by insect pests, where there have been storms, excessive floods, and during such periods there has not been a fair representative average. In those contingencies a part of this 10 percent can be taken to build up the units in such territory which may have been thus affected.

In addition to that, there is the small farmer who has been producing, say, one bale of cotton a year—and there are many of them, as there are a great many who produce two bales of cotton a year. In our desire, may I say to the Senator from Illinois, to treat with every possible liberality the little man, the small producer, and to be as helpful to him as we could, we have incorporated in the bill the provision which authorizes a reduction in the number of bales which may be produced here and there by what is known as the "cotton hog", the planter who plants nearly a hundred percent of his land in cotton.

It takes away from him, to a limited degree, not to exceed 10 percent of the total, which is put into this small pool from which to make fair and just and humane allotments to the small farmer, to the little fellow, to the man who has suffered from drought, and so forth, and here and there to give to the man who has planted no cotton at all, as the result of the exceedingly low price that cotton has been bringing during the last few years and who has, therefore, been devoting himself to other agricultural activities, a bale or two of the 10,000,000 bales of cotton authorized. So we regard that as a humane provision of this bill, one that will remove injustices from the small man and in no way afford encouragement to a larger acreage and a larger production of cotton. That is the purpose, may I explain to the Senator?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator to be good enough, if he will, to address himself to the question of the power of Congress, either directly or through the Department of Agriculture, to determine for the farmers how much cotton they may gin and sell or to allot to them a certain amount. I should like to hear that question discussed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that I have not brought a brief here. If he will read the opinion which has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think, of March 8, and which I had incorporated in the RECORD for the benefit of Senators who are interested in the legal aspects of the case, I think that his mind may be satisfied on that point.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator discuss that opinion at this time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will just say, Mr. President, that at this time I do not wish to go into a discussion of that branch of the subject. It might take an hour's time to discuss its constitutional phase. I wish to say that the power to levy a tax, which is the method of compulsion, if it may be so called, in this bill is analogous to the power sustained in the McCray case, known as the "oleomargarine case", in which the Supreme Court held that the power to tax was an express and specific power given by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States and that the courts would not seek to supervise the purpose and objective of Congress in levying a tax which it is authorized to levy.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question. Is not that precisely what the Court did do in the Dagenhart case and in Bailey against Drexel? Did not the Court hold in Bailey against Drexel that since the tax levied under the child-labor enactment on goods in interstate commerce was not for revenue but for the purpose of preventing child labor, it was void for being unconstitutional?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in the Dagenhart case, the child-labor case, the Court held that the tax was a direct tax upon production; that it was a specific and direct effort to regulate under the local police power the persons who should work in production, I believe, below a certain age. In that case the Court, by divided opinion of 5 to 4, held that the tax related, as I say, directly to production. The law put an income tax of 10 percent upon the net income of any employer for a year who employed for 1 hour during the year a child below the prescribed age. That is a correct statement, is it not, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think that is precisely correct. I will read portions of the case later on.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. That was so patently direct legislation to control persons who engage in production that the Court held that it was not, in its true sense, the levying of a tax but was nothing more, as the majority held, than an effort to supersede the police power of the State in the effort to regulate the age of children who could work in industry.

This bill does not propose a tax on production; it proposes a tax on the sale of cotton; but even if it were a tax on production, Mr. President, it is exactly like the oleomargarine tax. The law in that case levied a direct tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine that was colored, and one quarter of 1 percent a pound on oleomargarine uncolored. In the decision in that case, which I have here, it was held:

The oleomargarine act of 1886 (24 Stat. 209), as amended by the act of 1902 (32 Stat. 93), imposing a tax of one quarter of 1 percent on oleomargarine not artificially colored any shade of yellow so as to look like butter and 10 cents a pound if so colored, levies an excise tax and is not unconstitutional as outside of the powers of Congress, or an interference with the powers reserved to the States.

That was the point—the exercise of local police power under which the Dagenhart case was decided, that in that case there was an interference with the powers reserved to the States.

Nor can the judiciary declare the tax void because it is too high nor because it amounts to a destruction of the business of manufacturing oleomargarine, nor because it discriminates against oleomargarine and in favor of butter.

So I submit that if the tax provided in this bill is not valid, it is necessary for the Supreme Court of the United States to overturn its decision affirming by a unanimous Court the legality of the tax upon oleomargarine.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the Senator refers the bill and his argument to the oleomargarine case. That is set forth in One Hundred and Sixty-fifth United States Reports, page 526. Permit me to read to him from that case:

The oleomargarine legislation does not differ in character from this, and the object is the same in both, namely, to secure revenue by internal taxation and to prevent fraud in the collection of such revenue.

Very clearly the Court held in the oleomargarine case that that was a revenue act, and the machinery, by way of a stamp and a label, was for the purpose of preventing fraud. Will the Senator undertake to explain to me how he refers the pending bill to the law in the oleomargarine case in view of the plain statement of the case which I have just read?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not had an opportunity to examine the case referred to by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. It is in re Kollock, at page 526 in volume 165 of United States Reports. It is an opinion by the late Chief Justice Fuller.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not had an opportunity to read that case and therefore it is impossible for me at the moment to comment on it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has repeatedly referred this bill to the oleomargarine case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that the oleomargarine case?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; it is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The McCray case?

Mr. BAILEY. The Kollock case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am talking about the McCray case.

Mr. BORAH. That is in One Hundred and Ninety-fifth United States Reports.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the McCray case, the one about which I am talking, will be found in One Hundred and Ninety-fifth United States Reports. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will read it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, since the Senator is relying on the McCray case, I shall be glad if the Senator will state to the Senate the facts in that case.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is referring to the oleomargarine case which had to do with legislation which came from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I am sure the Senator is conversant with that legislation, which was founded upon the idea of preventing fraud, as many other legislative enactments have been based upon the same philosophy. The incidental power is to collect taxes as a part of the revenue.

In the case of the pending bill, its philosophy is based, not upon the collection of revenue, because none is anticipated other than in the nature of a penalty, but upon an effort to control production, which wholly, in my opinion, distinguishes and differentiates the bill from the oleomargarine law which the Senator attempts to cite as a precedent. That act and the bill now pending are on wholly different lines of philosophy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have been unable to find any statement upon which the Court based its decision or any reasoning upon which it reached its conclusion growing out of the collection of any revenue under the oleomargarine law.

Mr. McNARY. I am not familiar with that case; but to understand a case and apply the law, I think it is necessary to understand the philosophy upon which it is constructed. The object of the oleomargarine law was to prevent a substitute, such as oleomargarine, a substitute which cannot be detected by the eye, from being sold as butter. Therefore, the Congress, in order to prevent fraud and deception and deceit, enacted that law. The courts have upheld it upon that plain right of power. Incidental thereto is the collection of revenue. Those are the two propositions upon which the oleomargarine law and similar statutes are founded.

In this case, if the Senator has presented it properly, he is attempting to limit acreage and, therefore, affecting compulsory crop production by taxation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I am not attempting to limit production.

Mr. McNARY. That is what the bill provides as I read it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is nothing in it about limiting production.

Mr. McNARY. It is true there is no restriction or inhibition against the raising of 10,000,000 bales of cotton during the crop year 1934-35. That may be done, and that cotton when baled may be ginned without any tax being levied at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. All production in excess thereof, however, must pay a tax equal to one half the value of the cotton at the nearest market sales agency, and in no case less than 5 cents a pound. That is a tax to be covered into the Treasury of the United States. That is a penalty to prevent an excess production of cotton.

Then there is a further provision that the producer, if willfully attempting to produce and put into interstate commerce more than his allotment, may be imprisoned or fined, or both, in the discretion of the court.

If that is not clearly an effort through compulsion to limit production, then there is nothing in the Senator's bill supplementary to the Agricultural Administration Act which was passed last April and is now on the statute books.

It is clear to me that the philosophy upon which the oleomargarine legislation was based is wholly different from that of the pending bill, involving compulsion by the levying of a tax upon that which does not enter into interstate commerce. That which enters into interstate commerce goes without the tax. That which is produced in excess thereof is subject to the tax.

Therefore the Senator is trying to apply a punishment in the way of taxation to prevent production. If that is not the object of the bill, then I do not understand it, and I do not understand its philosophy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator from Oregon recognizes, because he was here and took an active part in the consideration and enactment of the oleomargarine legislation, that the sponsors of that legislation did not have in mind the welfare of the Treasury of the United States. I think the Senator will admit that.

Mr. McNARY. I stated it was incidental always, but the legislation was enacted in order to prevent deception and the practice of fraud in the sale of articles of food that resemble in physical appearance butter, a product of the cow.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator from Oregon recognizes that the purpose of the sponsors of that bill was to limit, as far as they could under the tax, the sale of that type of oleomargarine, not because of the fraud that might be involved but to prevent the sale of a commodity which came in competition with other commodities in which they were interested. Let us be frank about it. I am sure that no one who took part in the enactment of that legislation will deny that statement. The sponsors of the bill were seeking there to avoid the sale of as much oleomargarine as they could, because it came in conflict and competition with the sale of other commodities and reduced the sale of other agricultural competing commodities.

For that reason, in their ingenuity—and I have no criticism of it—they worked out the plan of a tax upon the sale of that class of oleomargarine. The law was sustained by the Supreme Court, because it was held that Congress had the power to levy an excise tax, and that the Court would not go into the purposes which prompted Congress to levy the tax. The only question was as to the power of Congress to levy the tax; and that being conceded, the Court held that it would not look into or impugn the motives of Congress. It would not seek to supervise the action of a coordinate branch of government upon a subject with which that coordinate branch of government had express power under the Constitution to deal.

I stated a while ago that an opinion had been put in the RECORD here. In connection with that opinion, it was stated in the RECORD, when it was put in, that I asked the Attorney General's office to give me the benefit of the advice and assistance of the best man they had on the subject. They did. They furnished me the assistance of an attorney who, I know, had the confidence of the Attorney General, because he was with him in person before the Banking and Currency Committee on an occasion when the legality of one of the great bills passed by Congress was under consideration. I turned over to this attorney a bill that had been introduced here which was exactly the same as the pending bill on the question now under consideration and asked him to look into it, to go into it fully, and to give me an opinion upon the subject. I did not want to urge the passage of a bill that was unconstitutional.

I have heard everybody at this session who opposed a pending measure of any paramount importance, and which involved a new form of legislation, question its constitutionality here from time to time. I heard the constitutional question raised when the Black 6-hour bill was pending before the Senate. I heard the opponents of that program day after day assail its constitutionality. I note that the Senate proceeded, in the exercise of its matured judgment, to pass that bill, and leave its constitutionality, even if it was perhaps a close question, to the decisions of the courts. I heard the same character of objections presented by those who opposed the passage of the national industrial recovery bill, the legality of which is based upon the grant to Congress in the Constitution of the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Those who raise these constitutional objections may have been right. I do not know. I did not think so, however. I made an argument here 2 years ago on the power of Congress under the Constitution to regulate, in the flow of interstate commerce, all forms of harmless commodities. I was convinced, after a careful study, that Congress had such power; and I invite anyone interested in that phase of this question to go back and read that argument, because it was the result of a most careful investigation. It was the subject of various colloquies here upon the floor. We had a protracted debate upon the question. I was convinced then of the power of Congress to deal with these phases of interstate commerce upon which the national industrial recovery bill was subsequently based for its constitutionality.

After those serious innovations and changes in our usual methods of government have passed through the Senate in the face of determined opposition by their opponents on the ground of unconstitutionality, when a bill involving agriculture comes to the front, when a bill is before us involving the happiness and the prosperity and the comfort of millions of people in this country, we find captious objections raised to its constitutionality.

I am sure some have genuine doubts on this subject, and I respect their views; but where there is such a genuine doubt I submit that in view of the various types of legislation that have heretofore been passed under criticism and under objection, all of which have been sustained that have so far reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and especially in view of the grave economic consequences involved, we should not here and now draw a new line when the welfare of millions and millions of people, not only this year but next year and possibly longer, is involved in legislation which at least meets the approval of the judgment of some of the best lawyers who are available.

I pointed out the opinion of the assistant furnished by the Department of Justice. I pointed out a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which to my mind settles the matter; and there are many others upon which it is based, such as the prohibitive tax upon the issue of State bank notes long, long ago, which was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, I recognize that this is the lunch hour, and that from physical necessity a great many Senators are not here whom I should like very much to have hear one phase of this discussion. I assume, however, that under the rules and practices of the Senate it will be necessary for me to proceed with the discussion, because I am extremely anxious, if possible, to secure final action on this bill before the Senate shall adjourn today. Planting is now going on down in southern Texas. It will of necessity take some time to set up the machinery for the administration of this bill. It has been under consideration for some time.

Let me say that this bill has not come to Congress from any theorist of any kind. This is a practical program which has developed out of the necessities of our situation. Let me say to those who do me the honor to remain here that the demand for the passage of this bill comes up from the very cotton rows of the South.

The man who thinks that the cotton farmer does not know his own business is simply out of touch with the experiences and the judgment of the cotton farmer. Year in and year out he has seen the price of cotton fluctuate violently, even during the same year. He has watched with interest the announcement of the estimates of the Government on the size of the crop. He has observed from time to time that as the estimate of the size of the crop increased the price of cotton decreased. He has observed the opposite—as the estimate was reduced the price of cotton increased.

I assume that many other agriculturists are in the same condition as the cotton farmer; but what I have said is peculiarly true of the cotton farmer, because of his dependence upon the world market for the sale of around 60 percent of his total crop. No other agricultural commodity looks to foreign markets, and must look to them, for the sale of so large a proportion of the total production as does cotton. There is no commodity, industrial or agricultural, which must find foreign markets to anything like the percentage that cotton does.

Sixty percent of all the money brought to the cotton farmers comes not from the consumers in America but from the consumers in the foreign countries of the world. It is a new addition each year to the capital assets of this country. It includes an average of around 25 percent in dollar value, over a long period of years, of all the money that comes to America as a result of the sale in foreign countries of the products of America, industrial and agricultural combined. So, when we figure upon a fair and reasonable price for cotton, we must bear in mind that when we get a fair price we are increasing the volume of money going into all the trade channels in America.

Mr. President, every mail every day carries a volume of checks and remittances out of the Cotton Belt to the industrial and financial sections of this country. We send money out for shoes, clothes, hats, farm implements, automobiles, radios, nearly everything of common use and consumption except food products, and we send a lot of money out even for food products. So that in the Cotton Belt, from lower Virginia to California, we are consumers, who provide a large market for the industries of the United States. We send checks to pay the interest upon mortgages, upon insurance premiums, upon railroad and utility bonds, and everything of that kind. They are not owned, except in a very small way, in the Cotton Belt. We must get the money from the sale of cotton to meet all those payments.

Only once a year do we have a return flow of money to the Cotton Belt. We ship very little of anything out of the Cotton Belt except cotton, and manufactured products of cotton from the textile mills located in the South. If we do not get in that return flow of money from the result of our cotton crop, a reasonable price for the cotton, then, of course, we cannot help to support the industries and financiers of this country. Therefore it is not solely a local problem in the Cotton Belt; it is a subject which ought to be of interest to every thoughtful man in the United States who is interested in the welfare of the people in all sections of this country.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator just now took the position that he was relying upon the McCray case, and invited me to read the decision in the case. I have sent to the library for the volume containing the decision, and, with the Senator's permission, I wish to read him the last two paragraphs from the decision in the case, McCray v. United States (195 U.S. Rep.):

Such concession, however, is not controlling in this case. This follows when the nature of oleomargarine, artificially colored to look like butter, is recalled. As we have said, it has been conclusively settled by this Court that the tendency of that article to deceive the public into buying it for butter is such that the State may, in the exertion of their police powers, without violating the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment, absolutely prohibit the manufacture of the article. It hence results that even although it be true that the effect of the tax in question is to repress the manufacture of artificially colored oleomargarine, it cannot be said that such repression destroys rights which no free government could destroy; and, therefore, no ground exists to sustain the proposition that the judiciary may invoke an implied prohibition, upon the theory that to do so is essential to save such rights from destruction. And the same considerations dispose of the contention based upon the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. That provision, as we have previously said, does not withdraw or expressly limit the grant of power to tax conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. From this it follows, as we have also previously declared, that the judiciary is without authority to avoid an act of Congress exerting the taxing power, even in a case where to the judicial mind it seems that Congress had in putting such power in motion abused its lawful authority by levying a tax which was unwise or oppressive, or the result of the enforcement of which might be to indirectly affect subjects not within the powers delegated to Congress.

Let us concede that if a case was presented where the abuse of the taxing power was so extreme as to be beyond the principles which we have previously stated, and where it was plain to the judicial mind that the power had been called into play not for revenue but solely for the purpose of destroying rights which could not be rightfully destroyed consistently with the principles of freedom and justice upon which the Constitution rests, that it would be the duty of the courts to say that such an arbitrary act was not merely an abuse of a delegated power, but was the exercise of an authority not conferred. This concession, however, like the one previously made, must be without influence upon the decision of this cause for the reasons previously stated; that is, that the manufacture of artificially colored oleomargarine may be prohibited by a free government without a violation of fundamental rights.

That clearly distinguishes, as I think, the present proposed legislation from the oleomargarine decisions in the Kollock case and in the McCray case. If the Senator can enlighten me, in view of what I have read—and he is certainly familiar with the case, and he is relying upon it—I will be very greatly helped in my thinking on this important legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that the statement of the Court, which, of course, is arguendo and therefore not a declaration of law upon the subject, in which the Court was answering the argument against the constitutionality of the oleomargarine tax, was to the effect that, conceding the position taken by the party to that case was correct, and to say no more than that, still it would not lead the Court to declare the act unconstitutional.

Mr. BAILEY. But in order to bring the Senator's proposed legislation within the doctrine of the Oleomargarine Act, he must show some analogy between the ginning of cotton and the coloring of oleomargarine, and I do not get the analogy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the oleomargarine tax was predicated upon the mere fact that the coloring of the oleomargarine authorized the tax.

Mr. BAILEY. Or the imitation of butter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Supreme Court would have sustained the tax on oleomargarine in any form, whether colored or uncolored, as I interpret the case.

Mr. BAILEY. We differ on that. Let me ask the Senator another question. What is the cost of the production of cotton? I take it no one here can testify more conclusively on that subject than the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, that, as the Senator knows, very greatly varies. It depends on many things. It depends on the cost of material, the cost of supplies, and the cost of labor.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator say that as a rule the cost of the production of cotton to the farmer is more than 50 percent of the price he receives?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That depends on the price.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator mean to tell the United States Senate that the farmers are now making 50 percent on the production of their cotton?

I think we ought to get right at the facts here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that I think the cost of production of cotton is practically its present price.

Mr. BAILEY. Its present price is 12 cents?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the cost of production has anything to do with the levying of the tax.

Mr. BAILEY. Its present price is 12 cents? Is that correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say I do not think the cost of production has anything to do with the levying of the tax.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not now disputing that; but I am trying to get the Senator to say that the cost of production of cotton, in his judgment, is today 12 and a fraction cents, that being the market price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The cost of some of it is and some of it is not. As I said, it depends on varying conditions.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the general cost of production of cotton?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That depends on what is included in the cost of production. There are many elements that may be included which the farmer does not include. The cost of the interest on the investment ought to be included in the cost of production.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator just now, I thought, said that the cost of production was equal to the present market price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is practically true on the average.

Mr. BAILEY. That is 12 and a fraction cents, is it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; it is about 12 cents, or under 12 cents.

Mr. BAILEY. How much?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is probably now under 12 cents.

Mr. BAILEY. A little under 12 cents?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us call it about 12 cents. A tax of 50 percent on the cotton above a certain quantity ginned would add that much to it, or take that much from the return, would it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. BAILEY. If the cost of production is now 11 cents, and the tax is 50 percent upon the pound, that would be a tax of 5½ cents on the pound, would it not? I ask the Senator would that not suppress the production of cotton in excess of 10,000,000 bales, and is that not the primary object of this proposed legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The primary purpose, of course, is to discourage the production of more cotton than the 10,000,000 bales.

Mr. BAILEY. And to make it financially impossible by imposing a tax that is equal to half the cost of production?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not base it on cost of production at all. I do not think that is an element that enters into the question. I think it is the same proposition that industrialists engage in of disposing of their surplus somewhere.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish the Senator would come down and make it very plain now. Is not the purpose of this proposed legislation to suppress the production of cotton in excess of 10,000,000 bales a year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; it is to prevent the sale of it without paying the tax.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator prevents a man from selling a thing, if that man is not entirely crazy, he certainly will not produce it; is that not so?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the Senator knows that we hope that no more than 10,000,000 bales of cotton will reach the market.

Mr. BAILEY. And that is the objective to be accomplished by this proposed legislation, and if that does not justify the legislation, nothing else will; is that not so?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Alabama has the floor. I am glad to have the testimony of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Let that go in the RECORD. The Senator from South Carolina said in answer to my question, "Yes." What does the Senator from Alabama say?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it will help, whether we limit it to 10,000,000 bales or they have slightly more.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not answering the question. I do not wish unduly to press my friend, but I believe I will ask him once more: Can this bill be justified on any theory other than the theory that it will restrain the farmers who produce cotton from producing in excess of 10,000,000 bales of cotton during the coming year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am afraid it will produce too much revenue, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not an answer to my question. I should like to have the Senator answer the question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have answered it.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the answer, please?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I said I was afraid it would produce too much revenue. There would be too much cotton sold at 50 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator consider that an answer to my question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I have asked the Senator what will be the effect of this proposed legislation, and he tells me he is afraid it will produce too much revenue. I submit that does not answer my question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I told the Senator what I had in mind about it.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator again: Is not the object of the bill to prevent the production of more than 10,000,000 bales of cotton this year in America?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then what is the object?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The object is to limit as closely as we can the sale of more than 10,000,000 bales, and to collect revenue upon the excess sold.

Mr. BAILEY. That is, to limit the sale, and to tell the farmer in advance that if he produces it he will be taxed 50 percent on the price?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I submit I have answered the Senator's question.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; I am satisfied with the answer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly—I do not want to take much more time—to the effect of the size of the crop of American cotton upon the price and the volume of money paid to the producers for their crop. I think to one who is really interested, Mr. President, in beneficial results for the Cotton Belt, that tells the whole story of this situation. That story ought to appeal to one who is really desirous of helping the cotton farmer, so far as he can conscientiously do so. I do not expect anybody to do it who cannot conscientiously do so; but that story ought to appeal to the judgment and to the heart of every person who can conscientiously vote to help the cotton farmer, and who is engaged in passing upon this great program, which is fraught with such tremendous results in the Cotton Belt.

I desire to call the Senate's attention to a graph on the wall, which was prepared by the Bureau of Economics in the Department of Agriculture, which shows the number of bales of cotton harvested each year, and the average price per pound paid to the farmer each year, beginning with 1890 and coming down to 1931.

The red line represents the volume of the production; the blue line represents the average farm price. I wish to call attention to the fluctuations in those two lines, from which will be noted that, with practical uniformity, as production increases the price to the farmer decreases, and as production decreases at the same time and in the same way the price to the farmer increases. This line [indicating] indicates the production; this line [indicating] represents the price. As production goes down the price goes up; the two move along practically in opposite directions all the way across the graph.

Now I come to the war period. This sector of the lines represents conditions in 1915. Then, of course, there was an abnormal demand for cotton in foreign countries for use for explosives and other purposes, which ran up the price at that time, during the years 1916, 1917, 1918, and in 1919, following the war, to abnormal points. The price went up then to 36 cents a pound. Production, as will be seen from the graph [indicating], had gone down and the price went up. Production went down because of the absence of man power engaged in the World War, and, therefore, with a limited supply of cotton and with a small surplus carried from time to time, the price of cotton continued to rise.

Now we come to the year 1920, which is known as the "year of the deflation", when all commodity prices, and particularly agricultural commodity prices, went to the bottom. The price of cotton dropped in 1 year from 36 cents a pound to 14 cents a pound. Fortunately, just at that time the bollweevil made its appearance in the South, and the production of cotton went down to 8,000,000 bales. When the production went down, it will be noticed that the price began to move back up. Here [indicating] in 1923 production reached 10,000,000 bales in round numbers—to be exact, 10,140,000 bales—and the price that same year moved up to 31 cents a pound. With that rise in price the acreage planted to cotton was increased all over the Cotton Belt. The farmers began to get better control over the bollweevil situation; the crops began to increase, and did rapidly increase in size. As a result production started up, and as it went up the price, as will be noted, crossed it and went down.

In 1926 we produced the largest crop of cotton ever produced in any one year in America; we produced 18,000,000 bales of cotton; and the price went down to slightly under 11 cents a pound, to this point [indicating on the graph] as a result of that large crop. Then production went down and the price went up. In 1931 we produced next to the largest crop, 17,000,000 bales, and the price went down around 5 cents a pound.

Now let me give Senators the figures which resulted from those fluctuations. Please bear in mind that the years to which I am now referring, the years from 1923 to 1927, we will say, represent a period in the business affairs of this country and of the world which was recognized everywhere as constituting the high tide in the flow of business not only nationally but internationally. There was strong buying power; there was unusual consumption; there was every element that should have held the price of cotton on an even keel; but it will be noticed that during the 5 or 6 years to which I am referring, while general business was flourishing, the price of cotton was not preserved at its proper place in the normal price structure.

Take 1923, in which there was produced a 10,000,000-bale crop. What did the farmers get for it? They got 31 cents a pound. There moved into the farmers' hands $1,571,000,000 for a 10,000,000-bale cotton crop. Next year, 1924, the bollweevil was under better control; the high price was attractive, and the crop was increased by three and a half million bales, up to 13,600,000 bales. The price dropped to 22½ cents, and the total amount received by the farmers was $1,540,000,000, very nearly the same as in the previous year; but it took thirteen and a half million bales of cotton that year to bring the farmer what 10,000,000 bales brought to him the previous year.

Take 1925; the crop went up to 16,000,000 bales; the price dropped to 18.2 cents; the total amount received by the farmers was $1,464,000,000, almost the same amount as in 1923, but it took 16,000,000 bales of cotton to bring the same amount of money to the farmers that 10,000,000 bales brought in 1923 and that thirteen and a half million bales brought in 1924.

Now we come to 1926, which was the year of the big crop, 18,000,000 bales. The price dropped to 10.9 cents; the total amount of money received by the farmers was $982,000,000. In short, for 8,000,000 bales more of cotton than were produced in 1923 the farmers received $600,000,000 less money.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that in 1926 business was at a point that is recognized as representing almost ideal conditions. General commodity prices for that year are recognized as being on a level to which we should now, if we can, raise general prices; but in that year, that almost perfect business year, with a most desirable price level, the price of cotton dropped far, far below the cost of production. Why? I ask. For one reason, and one reason alone. There was no depression; there was, if anything, an increase in consumption; purchasing power was constant and strong. The price of cotton dropped for one reason, and for one reason alone, and that was the size of the crop, the production of so much more cotton than there was an effective demand for purposes of consumption.

Let us take 1927. The 2 years 1926 and 1927 are almost identical. The size of the crop dropped 5,000,000 bales, going down to about 13,000,000 bales as against 18,000,000 bales; the price jumped up to 19.6 cents; the volume of money realized by the farmers was $1,286,000,000.

Take the 2 years 1926 and 1927; with 5,000,000 bales less of cotton, the farmers received $350,000,000 more in money.

I ask any thoughtful student what would be the effect if we could draw a straight line across that wildly fluctuating red line of production? I ask any fair-minded man if at the same time there would not be drawn a straight blue line indicating a stabilization of the price of cotton at a point where it properly belongs in the price structure and in the uses of cotton in the world?

These figures show a most terrible economic waste; they show a most destructive loss of purchasing and consuming power not only on the part of our own cotton-section people but on the part of people in our industrial section, resulting in the loss of so much foreign money which the cotton crop would bring to this country if we could secure for it a reasonable and fair price. Nobody wants cotton at an artificially high price.

Mr. President, I am not going to take any more of the time of the Senate. As I stated in the beginning, this bill comes before the Senate with the support of the cotton farmers. A questionnaire sent out showed that 95 percent of the cotton farmers answering favored the bill. They know their situation; they know they cannot get a fair price until there can be brought about a reduction in their carry-over. Nearly every cotton farmer is willing to reduce production if he only knows that the other producers are also going to reduce their cotton production. All they want to know, any of them, is that all will act alike, for they know that production has got to come down. They want to bring it down, but while bringing it down they want to know that the man here is not going to reduce his production while the fellow across the creek or somewhere else is maintaining or increasing his production. So the Congress has been asked to give them this bill.

I cannot imagine why Senators or Congressmen should be reluctant about it. Consider the vote at the other end of the Capitol, of the Representatives, who are in direct touch with the people. A new program? Yes; one that required them naturally to know the views of their constituents, one involving a limitation, if we may so call it, upon the individualistic views heretofore followed. Naturally they would be reluctant there, with the elections coming on, to go counter to the wishes of these toilers in the field. Over there the vote was 251 to 114, with only five Members from the Cotton Belt, from California to Virginia, voting against the program.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question if I can.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I heard one Congressman from the South quoted as saying that if he did not vote for the bill this year he could not be elected in 1934, but if he voted for it and was elected in 1934, he could not be reelected in 1936. This is a facetious observation, but it leads me to inquire of the Senator whether the cotton planters will not rebel against the restriction when they meet it in fact, although they contemplate it with some equanimity in prospect. Does the Senator think it will work to that effect?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am willing to stake my political destiny on its working. I think it that strongly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator believed that the plow-under campaign would succeed last year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It did succeed tremendously. It saved our people from ruin. They did not go far enough. I begged them to plow under 50 percent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It succeeded, but they ran into human nature, plus four times as much fertilizer as they ever ran into before, according to the experience of the Southern Railway as recently reported in Time magazine.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. May I correct the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]? He is under the impression that last year there was an excess of fertilizer used. That is not correct, for the reason that the plow-up did not take place until the cotton in some instances was open. The cotton farmers had no knowledge that the plan would be put into operation, and therefore it did not affect the purchase of fertilizer at all or the acreage that was left in cotton. The majority of it was plowed up after part of it had matured, so the question of fertilizer did not enter into it at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is the point: We discovered there was a back door or side door to the voluntary scheme. If there had not been a back door the bill of the Senator from Alabama would not be here today. He would not be seeking to substitute compulsion for voluntary action. What I want to know is whether there is any way the farmers similarly could avoid, by any detour whatever, compliance with the effective purposes of this new bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the Senator will help to close every possible loophole in the bill and make it as tight and effective as it is possible to make it.

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator allow me a moment further?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I do not like the implication to go out that anybody used any back door or any subterfuge to increase the crop last year. I call attention to the fact that in 1929 we planted 43,000,000 acres of cotton and made 14,000,000 bales. In 1931 we planted 38,000,000 acres and made 17,000,000 bales. Cotton is the most sensitive plant to season that I know of in agriculture. The question last year was not an excess use of fertilizer but it was what is known as a "cotton year." Every now and then we have an ideal season. The yield per acre last year, as has occurred perhaps four or five times in the last 25 or 30 years, was abundant. The season hit it exactly. It was not on account of the farmer trying to side-step or use any subterfuge.

I stand here today to say that I believe the Agricultural Department and the public who understand the situation never saw a more unanimous effort and a more fixed determination and a more enthusiastic entrance into a plan than the farmers in the plow-up business to carry out their part of it honestly and meticulously.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, just one further question, if the Senator from Alabama will yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In seeking to close the back doors and the side doors, if there be any—let me put it that way—does the Senator from Alabama think that the tax proposed in the bill will be effective, or will there be sales in spite of the tax?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am going to offer an amendment to increase the amount of the tax, and I hope the Senator will help me make it more effective.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So that if possible there will be no sales as a result?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I seek.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator stated a moment ago that he intends to offer an amendment to increase the tax. May I say that I have received quite a number of telegrams from Louisiana suggesting that the tax should be increased in order to effectuate the purpose of the bill. I am very glad the Senator is going to offer that kind of an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a committee amendment on that point. We have all agreed to it. We are going to make the bill effective if we can possibly do so. We have an amendment increasing the tax to 75 percent.

Mr. President, if there is no one else who wants to speak at this time, I wish to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, on page 2, line 15, to strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall be effective with respect to the crop years 1934-35 and 1935-36, and any crop year thereafter when the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing will continue or is likely to continue to exist so that the application of this act with respect to a crop year is necessary in the public interest in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1, he shall so proclaim, and this act shall be effective with respect to that crop year. If at any time the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to lint cotton during that crop year after the effective date of said proclamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON CERTAIN FUNDS REPRESENTED BY DRAFTS ON THE SECRETARY OF STATE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State, to the end that legislation may be enacted to authorize an appropriation of not exceeding $44,403.15 for the payment of interest on funds represented by drafts drawn on the Secretary of State by the American Embassy in Petrograd and the American Embassy in Constantinople and transfers which the Embassy at Constantinople undertook to make by cable communications to the Secretary of State between December 23, 1915, and April 21, 1917, in connection with the representation by the Embassy of the interests of certain foreign governments and their nationals.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 24, 1934.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy very much time, though I desire to say a few words upon the proposal now pending.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the theory that in order to assure a higher price level for farm products the price will have to be determined very largely by supply and demand; in other words, that the price is not going to be determined by what Congress says, but rather by the operation of normal, economic law, which must be determined on the basis either of ability to buy or ability to reduce an oversupply. Of course the normal way to bring about the desired result would be to increase the demand, if we knew how to do it. If that may not be done, then quite naturally we would think the next step would be to reduce the supply; but I have stated, as it has been stated many times before I ever made the statement, that an attempt to solve the problem on the basis of reduction of the supply is dangerous. If the product of the farm were not a food product or a necessary of life, the question would not be so serious; but the farm produces the necessities of life, and we are proceeding to limit the supply of something we must have that is largely under the control of the elements, over which neither man nor his expressions through legislation can have any influence.

The question has been in my mind several times since this debate started: If by action of the Government we should command a reduction in the production of these necessities, and then, through the operation of elements that we cannot control, there should be a shortage, and suffering incident to that shortage, what responsibility would the Government have, its action being the cause of the shortage? I think we must consider that probability.

When we have a smaller acreage under good conditions producing a greater crop than a larger acreage under bad conditions, we will not be faced with that difficulty; but if we should have, under the restriction of production, a bad year, and through that suffer, it seems to me that the Government would have some responsibility to the sufferers, and that responsibility would be without limit. That is one element that must be considered here.

Furthermore, while I admit that reduction might be desirable if it could be accomplished by cooperation, I have great fear of going to the extent of bringing it about by compulsion. Cooperation to bring about reduction all of us could approve; but reduction by law is something that I hesitate very seriously to embark upon, for there is so much involved in it.

There is another point that we must not overlook in our consideration of this proposal: I think the strongest passion in the human breast is that which involves the rights of ownership. I believe there is nothing in our make-up more dominating than the feeling that a man is monarch of what he owns. That is expressed in many ways, and certainly is being expressed in a great body of correspondence that is reaching Washington at this time.

I have just received a letter written in longhand by a farmer. Examination of the penmanship indicates that it is from an average hard-working man who does not engage very much in letter writing; but it seems to me that what he says is the ordinary, common-sense view of the average citizen. He writes as follows:

Our daily paper tells of the Bankhead cotton control bill passing the House; and the way it is represented in our papers leads me to believe that all agriculture is soon to be regulated in the same way.

I am one of the temporary county corn-hog reduction committee chosen by the State officials, and I have been elected permanently to represent our part of the county in the county organization. Now, if this Bankhead bill uses as its base for regulation statutes procured in the cotton-reduction plan last year, it is logical for me to believe that our corn-hog figure will be used in a like manner.

I would be very much opposed to making anything of this sort permanent. We hear much about "rugged individualism" cussed in all directions now, but it seems to be forgotten that rugged individualism is exactly what wrested this country from the Indian and made it the most desirable country of all the world in which to live.

Will you please advise if I am right in my surmise of the cotton situation, and the likelihood of a corn-hog-control bill being passed with provisions like the Bankhead bill about cotton? If so, the so-called "reduction payments" are a sugar-coated pill that robs us of our most prized possession—freedom to do as we please on the land that is deeded to us, without restriction by this same Government.

Please answer.

And the writer signs his name as a farmer from Ohio.

Mr. President, I am of the opinion that that letter pretty well expresses the feeling of the average farmer throughout the United States. I have reached the conclusion that such is his view not only because of the numerous letters I have received—and they come from all sections of the country—but because what is proposed here appeals to me as an interference with what the average man regards as one of his rights. I think he naturally feels that any interference of this kind is without justice, and it certainly will be resisted with an intensity that we never yet have fully realized.

The present Presiding Officer (Mr. GEORGE in the chair) will remember what a terrific reaction there was when we undertook to put into force the corn-borer legislation. All of us considered that that legislation was in the interest of agriculture. Everyone must admit that when there is such a danger as that, it would be the height of foolishness for us not to meet it on the threshold. That is why I never have hesitated to vote to eradicate a pest whose depredations were obvious, such as the bollweevil and the various forms of scale that attacked our fruits, and other pests which were making invasions upon our productive ability. For that reason I did not hesitate, although under considerable protest from various sections, to authorize Federal authority to go on the farm and state that if the farmer himself did not take the precautions and do what was necessary to prevent the further invasion of the corn borer, the Federal Government would do it for him.

Everyone will recall with what terrific opposition that interference with the farmer, even when it was on his own behalf, met from the farmer himself. It was largely due, I know, to the manner in which the law was being enforced. Some little whippersnapper sent out by Federal authority goes to a farm and tells the farmer that if he does not do a certain thing within a certain time it will be done for him. That stirs the average farmer to the point where he almost wishes to commit murder. That is because of his feeling that the farm is his, and he does not want somebody who knows nothing about it to come to him and tell him what to do.

I am afraid if this measure shall become a law, if it can in any form be justified in its application to cotton, that similar legislation will be demanded from certain sections on the part of other farmers, perhaps as to wheat and corn, perhaps as to every commodity which is produced in great quantities. We are entering now upon a new course. I am saying nothing about its constitutionality. I am not speaking of whether it is an emergency measure or a permanent one. I assume that it will be permanent if it shall prove to have any merit at all. I am afraid, however, that under the stress of an emergency we are entering on a course that is to become permanent not only in this case but in the broad field of agriculture. I think it never can become permanent generally, because I think that the revulsion of sentiment is going to be so terrific that nobody would feel free to undertake to extend the Federal authority over the farmer in the various States.

Mr. President, a step toward denying to the individual citizen the control of his own business goes further than any step we have ever yet taken. It seems somewhat dangerous when we do it in connection with voluntary cooperation, and yet when it can be done in such cases, I cannot see any legitimate objection to it. There might be an objection where the Government pays for doing it voluntarily—I think there is objection to that—but that is neither here nor there; that is water over the wheel. However, here is a proposal which goes far beyond anything we have heretofore undertaken. If I do not mistake, it is going to create such a combined opposition, coming from every section of the country, that it will arouse a class feeling for action in accordance with what they seem to think is their best interest, which will come up from the landed people, who are, after all, what is left in the United States of independence.

As I have previously stated, I know of no passion that is stronger than the feeling that leads one to say, "This is mine. It is not only mine to hold but it is mine to convey if I want to, without any interference with that right, not only that the property is mine to do as I want to do with but that it is mine to sow when I want to, and with what I want to, and to the extent I desire, without having to come to Washington for permission before I do it."

If we shall embark on a policy which will ultimately reach the point where a farmer cannot put a plow in a field or turn a single furrow before he comes to Washington and gets permission, we will create a feeling which will be unlike anything that has ever been known in the United States. Then in 2 or 3 months, after he has the permission, the farmer will have some Government inspector coming to his farm and going over the planting to ascertain whether the regulations of the Federal Government are being respected. Can anybody fully appreciate the reaction of the farmer who will thus be put under the eye of the inspector?

Senators who are moving in this direction certainly ought to know where they are going. I am saying nothing about the impracticability of the plan; I am saying nothing about the impossibility of enforcing the proposed law.

Mr. President, the present Presiding Officer and I stood together in the attempt to enforce the prohibition law, and all will admit the terrific revulsion of public sentiment, which was the most surprising reaction I have ever known, which put out of existence by a flood of opinion not only the statute which was written in pursuance of constitutional sanction but also the constitutional sanction was put out of existence in a way that was more surprising than anything that has occurred in my political experience. That was largely due to the inability to make the enforcement effective. Yet here is a proposal to place every farmer under the eye of the Government, because I have a right to assume that if this is a good thing for the cotton farmer it will be extended to every one of the 6,000,000 farmers in the United States, who will be placed under the regulation of the Federal statute. If we could not enforce prohibition, how can we enforce this particular plan, which would interfere with the individual right of the owner of every foot of land in the United States?

Senators ought to realize the direction in which they are going. I am not concerned about the length of the step; I am more concerned about the direction of the step. It seems to me that we ought to proceed cautiously when we are proceeding along lines which interfere with such rights.

Mr. President, there came to me yesterday a publication known as "Hoard's Dairyman", a journal devoted to dairy farming. In it I find the following:

AS DAIRYMEN SEE FARM RELIEF

More than 2,000 letters accompanying questionnaires have renewed our faith and confidence in the intelligence and understanding of the man milking cows.

Nearly 24,000 dairy-farm folks, mailing in 4,909 questionnaires from every State in the Union, have given us their answers to the question, "What do you think of farm relief?" Those 4,909 families operate 838,529 acres of land and milk 87,380 cows. To them dairy-farm relief is a tremendously serious proposition. Their living will be directly affected by any governmental action. Many of these people have expressed a feeling of gratitude at having an opportunity to give their opinion.

I ask permission to have the whole article published in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I read further from this magazine.

The verdict of 4,909 farm families in a Nation-wide poll from the following questions and answers is as follows:

In your opinion, will the Government plan for the control of production of all farm products be helpful to agriculture as a whole?

One thousand three hundred and sixty-six answered "yes."

One thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine answered "no."

One thousand three hundred and forty answered "It might be."

Has the cotton-allotment plan helped you?

"Yes", 228.

"No", 2,424.

Ten times as many answered "no" as answered "yes."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat that? What was the question?

Mr. FESS. "Has the cotton-allotment plan helped you?"

Mr. SMITH. There has not been any cotton-allotment plan. What is this man talking about?

Mr. FESS. This relates to the reduction of acreage. I am reading a statement in answer to the questionnaire that was sent out by this farm journal:

Has the cotton-allotment plan helped you?

"Yes", 228.

"No", 2,424.

"Perhaps", 124.

Has the cotton-allotment plan cost you money?

Two thousand eight hundred and thirty-six answered "yes."

Three hundred and sixty-four answered "no."

Two hundred and fourteen answered "maybe."

Has the wheat-allotment plan helped you?

Six hundred and nineteen answered "yes."

Two thousand four hundred and thirty-nine answered "no."

Two hundred and thirty-three answered "perhaps."

Has the wheat-allotment plan cost you money?

Two thousand six hundred and fifty-nine answered "yes."

Four hundred and sixty-one answered "no."

Two hundred and eighty-one answered "maybe."

Will the corn-hog allotment plan help you?

One thousand one hundred and thirty-seven answered "yes."

Two thousand and sixty-two answered "no."

Six hundred and forty answered "perhaps."

Will the corn-hog allotment plan cost you money?

One thousand six hundred and sixty-five say it will.

Six hundred and ninety-eight say it will not.

Four hundred and forty-seven say it may.

Has the N.R.A. raised prices of things you buy?

Four hundred and forty-five said "yes."

One hundred and three said "no."

Eighty-six are noncommittal.

Has the N.R.A. raised prices of things you sell?

Five hundred say "yes."

Three thousand one hundred and seventy-three say "no."

Evidently that would be where the processing tax was assessed back on the producer, instead of being passed on to the consumer. If it could be passed on to the consumer, evidently it would increase prices, but, on the other hand, if it should be assessed on the producer, it would have the effect of reducing prices.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator pardon me for asking who sent out the questionnaires and from what he is reading?

Mr. FESS. I am reading from Hoard's Dairyman, a journal devoted to dairy farming. It is published in Wisconsin. This [indicating] is the journal itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. The questionnaire was sent out by whom?

Mr. FESS. By the journal itself, I assume.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the date of the issue?

Mr. FESS. The date is March 25, 1934.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio from what journal he is reading?

Mr. FESS. I am reading from Hoard's Dairyman, a journal published at Fort Atkinson, Wis., a journal which came to my office today, and I assume a copy of it came to the Senator's office.

Mr. SMITH. As soon as the Senator from Ohio shall have finished I should like to analyze the situation with reference to which the Senator says 2,000 replies were received indicating that the action of last year did not help. I will not undertake to do so now, but when the Senator shall have concluded I should like to state the facts.

Mr. FESS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator from South Carolina do so. I desire to have the Senator know that this publication, which came to my desk on yesterday, attracted my attention when I saw the announcement of the answers to so many questions sent out. It seems to me to be very pertinent to bring it to the attention of the Senate while we are discussing the pending legislation. If there is nothing to it, the Senator is at liberty to show that to be so.

Mr. SMITH. I should hate to think that the 2,000 who said they received no benefit from the action of the farmers in the Cotton Belt last year were from the South. I do think that our people have at least common sense and decency, and I do not believe there are that many cotton growers in the South who would actually stultify themselves by making such replies.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I had not intended to read the article. I had asked unanimous consent, which was granted, to insert the article in its entirety in the RECORD without reading; but I will read the article if the Senator wishes me to do so, because it indicates that the writer does know what he is talking about. It discusses the cotton question. As I said, I do not know these people, and I have not verified the figures. I am giving them as they are printed here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if he has information concerning how many of those questions which were sent from Wisconsin were sent down into the Cotton Belt.

Mr. FESS. I do not know. I do not know where they were sent.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator read the article.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, out of respect for the Senators favoring the legislation who wish to get on with their work, I will not take the time to read the article. I will simply insert it in the RECORD. If I were merely desirous of killing time, I should read it and comment on it, but I do not want to engage in any act of that kind. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire me to read the article?

Mr. SMITH. No; I do not think it is necessary. What the Senator has already read is sufficient.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from South Carolina read it?

Mr. SMITH. I will undertake to read it if the Senator will give me a chance to make a little speech myself. Under those conditions I will promise the Senator to read it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I suggest that as the basis for some argument on the part of the Senator from South Carolina the Senator from Ohio read the article, because it is a very informative article, and the paper in which it appears is one of the outstanding farm papers of the Middle West.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I will read the article.

Mr. SMITH. The testimony of the Senator who has just taken his seat still further weakens the entire argument.

Mr. FESS. I will read it:

What do you think of farm relief? Those 4,909 families operate 888,529 acres.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Ohio, I am sure, will admit, as he is fair, and I know him so well, that the pending legislation is of great importance, and there are two sides to it.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator does not prod me too much I will not read the article.

Mr. SMITH. I will sit down.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time to read the article, but the Senator was putting me in a position where I would have had to read it. Otherwise, he would think that I was trying to escape the force of his statement.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no!

Mr. FESS. I do not want to do that. I will finish the summary of the article, and then I will give way.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator enlighten us by telling us where the questionnaires went? It seems to me it is impracticable to find out about the cotton section by sending questionnaires to the dairy section.

Mr. FESS. I understand that questionnaires on cotton were sent to the cotton section, and questionnaires on wheat were sent to the wheat section.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the article say so?

Mr. FESS. It does not say so, but I assume so. The subtitle is:

More than 2,000 letters accompanying questionnaires have renewed our faith and confidence in the intelligence and understanding of the man milking cows.

I assume that these questionnaires were sent to the people who have the information. Otherwise, I could not imagine any sense to it at all.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The article speaks of the intelligence and understanding of the man milking cows. I wonder what that has to do with the cotton section.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Senator had better read the article.

Mr. FESS. I think I will read the article:

An analysis of the opinions of these people is presented for those sincerely interested in upbuilding the dairy industry.

The doubt as to the advisability of having governmental plans for production control of agricultural crops is very evident in dairy farmers' minds. Thirty-one percent of all votes cast on this question said governmental plans would be helpful. Thirty-nine percent said "No" to this, and 30 percent answered this question with a "Maybe." Many letters, in discussing this question, stated that dairy farming did not belong under the A.A.A.; that governmental schemes breed inefficiency, and that the man who has learned to do a better job of farming is unduly penalized in the shuffle. Many readers have expressed the conviction that there is no burdensome overproduction in the dairy business and that our trouble may be due to underconsumption.

We need make no comment on the vote as it pertains to the cotton and wheat allotment program. These governmental schemes have, without question, been of no benefit to dairymen, have raised the prices of things he normally would buy, and have helped bring about a positive reversal of the enviable position formerly held by this industry.

We have received some criticism for including any questions on the N.R.A. and C.W.A., but we felt our readers had a perfect right to voice their opinions for or against any program that in any way affected them and their living. The fact that 95 percent of all who sent in questionnaires expressed their opinions on the N.R.A., shows the interest dairymen have in this sister ship of the A.A.A. Letters from our readers forcefully expressed their condemnation of this governmental venture. One New York farmer's story summed up the feeling of many when he said,

"We would have been a great many days farther out of the woods if the N.R.A. had never been forced upon our city cousins."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is obvious that the article relates to the effect upon the dairy farmer of what has been done with wheat and cotton rather than the effect upon the wheat grower or the cotton grower.

Mr. FESS. I think so. I assume that the major interest of this magazine is the dairy industry. While I should not be justified in saying that every article printed in it is of major interest to the dairy industry in its entirety, I can easily see that a publication of this kind would be of major interest to the dairy industry rather than to the public at large, and if the Senator asks me whether it is not obvious that the paper is primarily interested in dairying, I should have to say it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not mean that. The questionnaire was directed to the wheat-curtailment plan in respect to its influence upon the dairy business, was it not?

Mr. FESS. Let me read the first paragraph again:

Nearly 24,000 dairy-farm folks, mailing in 4,909 questionnaires from every State in the Union—

That answers the question—have given us their answers to the question—

Here is the question:

"What do you think of farm relief?" Those 4,909 families operate 888,529 acres of land and milk 87,380 cows.

That would indicate that the questionnaire was sent to people who were primarily interested in cows, if that is the question to which the Senator wants an answer.

The vote on the farm-loan proposition was practically 50-50. Letters carried many sensible arguments on all sides of the loan program. A former cow tester now in the farm-implement business writes us: "My experience in several years selling farm equipment is that if I sell any man more than he can pay for I am 50 percent or more to blame, and that should apply to Uncle Sam as well." We have felt that this particular feature of governmental assistance possibly could do no more to relieve agricultural distress than any other.

Question 8 is:

Mark yes or no on the following dairy plans as to their possibility of helping you as a farmer:

- (a) The butter-fat allotment plan.
- (b) The Hoard's Dairyman plan.
- (c) The diseased-cow plan.

The article proceeds:

Question 8, giving dairy farmers a chance to name the plan most likely to benefit them, naturally holds the spotlight. Voting in favor of the governmental butter-fat allotment program under the A.A.A., we find 18 percent of all votes cast on this point. Against this plan we find 82 percent; 89 percent of those voting on the Hoard's Dairyman cow-culling plan said "yes", 11 percent said "no"; 58 percent of those expressing an opinion on the diseased-cow program voted "yes", 42 percent voted "no." It is interesting as well as significant that seven times as many votes were cast in favor of the Hoard's Dairyman cow-culling program as for the butter-fat allotment, and two times more than for the diseased-cow plan.

We have proposed a combination of cow-culling and diseased-cow plans but separated them on this questionnaire to get an expression of the importance of each in the minds of men milking cows.

We wish everyone who claims to have the dairy farmers' interest at heart, or who is in a position of governmental authority, could read the 2,000 letters we have received on this matter of a dairy plan—

And so forth. Now, I will finish the summary.

9. Should dairy-processing taxes be assessed on the basis of:

(a) A certain number of cents per pound fat on all butterfat produced?—Yes, 558; no, 1,842.

(b) A rate per pound fat that would vary according to the price received by producers?—Yes, 1,912; no, 980.

10. Should the Federal Government prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine?—Yes, 3,540; no, 745.

11. Should the legal fat standard for butter and all other dairy products be raised?—Yes, 1,845; no, 1,678.

Mr. President, I have taken much more time than I had intended to take, very largely because an analysis of the cross section of public opinion on the control of agriculture from Washington would indicate that it is not popular, and certainly as the days pass it will grow more unpopular. I do not think that the American farmer, who is the last stronghold of individualism, is going to submit to such control without a serious protest. How far that protest will go, no one can tell, because that passion is all-controlling.

The present Presiding Officer (Mr. OVERTON in the chair) will readily recall the ancient custom in peasant life in countries such as Yugoslavia. For example, when a peasant dies in Carniola he is always buried with a handful of dirt taken from one of his fields placed under his head. That is a sacred custom, never departed from for centuries. The dirt is taken from his field and placed under his head so that he may know he is sleeping on his own soil. That expresses the passion which is innate in the American agriculturist, and any effort to interfere with his freedom by compulsion from Washington is going, in due time, to be met, I think, by a terrific revulsion of sentiment.

While I sympathize with the objective the proponents of the pending legislation have in mind, I do not believe it proposes a safe procedure, and for that reason I cannot go along with it.

[From Hoard's Dairyman, Mar. 25, 1934]

AS DAIRYMEN SEE FARM RELIEF—MORE THAN 2,000 LETTERS ACCOMPANYING QUESTIONNAIRES HAVE RENEWED OUR FAITH AND CONFIDENCE IN THE INTELLIGENCE AND UNDERSTANDING OF THE MAN MILKING COWS

Nearly 24,000 dairy-farm folks, mailing in 4,909 questionnaires from every State in the Union, have given us their answers to the question, "What do you think of farm relief?" Those 4,909 families operate 888,529 acres of land, and milk 87,380 cows. To them, dairy-farm relief is a tremendously serious proposition. Their living will be directly affected by any governmental action. Many of these people have expressed a feeling of gratitude at having an opportunity to give their opinion.

An analysis of the opinions of these people is presented for those sincerely interested in upbuilding the dairy industry.

The doubt as to the advisability of having governmental plans for production control of agricultural crops is very evident in dairy farmers' minds. Thirty-one percent of all votes cast on this question said governmental plans would be helpful. Thirty-nine percent said "no" to this, and 30 percent answered this question with a "maybe." Many letters, in discussing this question, stated that dairy farming did not belong under the A.A.A.; that governmental schemes breed inefficiency and that the man who has learned to do a better job of farming is unduly penalized in the shuffle. Many readers have expressed the conviction that there is no burdensome overproduction in the dairy business and that our trouble may be due to underconsumption.

These governmental schemes have, without question, been of no benefit to dairymen, have raised the prices of things he normally would buy, and have helped bring about a positive reversal of the enviable position formerly held by this industry.

We have received some criticism for including any questions on the N.R.A. and C.W.A., but we felt our readers had a perfect right to voice their opinions for or against any program that in any way affected them and their living. The fact that 95 percent of all who sent in questionnaires expressed their opinion on the N.R.A. shows the interest dairymen have in this sister ship of the A.A.A. Letters from our readers forcefully expressed their condemnation of this governmental venture. One New York farmer's story summed up the feeling of many when he said, "We would have been a great many days farther out of the woods if the N.R.A. had never been forced upon our city cousins."

The vote on the farm-loan proposition was practically 50-50. Letters carried many sensible arguments on all sides of the loan program. A former cow tester now in the farm-implement business writes us: "My experience in several years selling farm equipment is that if I sell any man more than he can pay for I am 50 percent or more to blame, and that should apply to Uncle Sam as well." We have felt that this particular feature of governmental assistance possibly could do no more to relieve agricultural distress than any other.

Question 8, giving dairy farmers a chance to name the plan most likely to benefit them naturally holds the spotlight. Voting in favor of the governmental butterfat-allotment program under the A.A.A. we find 18 percent of all votes cast on this point. Against this plan we find 82 percent. Eighty-nine percent of those voting on the Hoard's Dairyman cow-culling plan said "yes"; 11 percent said "no." Fifty-eight percent of those expressing an opinion on the diseased-cow program voted "yes"; 42 percent voted "no." It is interesting, as well as significant, that seven times as many votes were cast in favor of the Hoard's Dairyman cow-culling program as for the butter-fat allotment, and two times more than for the diseased-cow plan.

We have proposed a combination of cow-culling and diseased-cow plans, but separated them on this questionnaire to get an expression of the importance of each in the minds of men milking cows.

We wish everyone who claims to have the dairy farmer's interest at heart or who is in a position of governmental authority could read the 2,000 letters we have received on this matter of a dairy plan. That the dairy farmer is thinking hard and sure would be the inevitable conclusion. His arguments are sane, conservative, and without prejudice. Facts and figures as to why the butter-fat allotment program is not sound and not practical are to be found without number. Constructive criticism, as well as appreciated support, is to be found in the letters on the other two plans. A statement from one letter reads: "If we all would discuss the farmers' problems as simply, clearly, and unbiased as Hoard's Dairyman always has, they would be solved more quickly and easily."

We feel that in fairness to all who answered question 9 on the processing tax, we should try to portray the feeling of the dairy farmer on this method of raising money from which to pay benefits. Our question asked for a choice of two methods of applying this tax. The vast majority of dairy farmers write that they do not want a processing tax. The brief comments carried in the border on this page are typical of a great many statements on the processing tax received from every State in the Union.

To the actual figures on this page, compiled in the table below, we should add the votes of county dairy committees, State breeders' associations, community clubs, dairymen's associations, and farm organizations that have discussed the Hoard's Dairyman questionnaire. This would add many thousands in actual numbers, but the farmers' views as expressed in the table below would be unchanged.

We want to take this opportunity of thanking our readers for their genuine response. Our faith in the man on the dairy farm has been materially strengthened again. We renew our pledge to carry on for the best interests of this, America's biggest industry.

PROCESSING-TAX COMMENTS

"It would be, to our way of thinking, just as logical to place a processing tax on labor as to tax the products that a farmer gains by labor."—E. W., Ohio.

"Most farmers of my section believe that a process tax would more than offset any benefit to dairy farmers."—L. B., Oklahoma.

"It seems to me that the process tax would lower consumption of dairy products rather than increase it, and that is the very thing which we do not want."—D. E. S., Michigan.

"As to taxing dairy products I am of the opinion that it would be the same as that of taxing hogs. I am sure it will be passed back to the producer."—G. S., Texas.

"This processing tax does not benefit either the producer or consumer, but it is used to pay the men who are sent around as bosses or overseers. The processing tax on wheat has raised the price of flour, bread, and crackers, with very little rise in the price of wheat."—W. T. S., Idaho.

"I am hoping there will be no processing tax on dairy products—and if there is, let it be a uniform tax."—F. K., Virginia.

"I think the processing tax is the most fool thing ever thought of. The way it worked for the hog men, they paid the tax instead of the consumer."—D. C., Vermont.

"I am emphatically against either a processing tax or the allotment plan as applying to poultry or dairy products."—G. A. F., Wyoming.

"A processing tax is unfair in every way. It could readily be used to destroy."—A. C. M., Indiana.

"Instead of talking processing tax and thereby reducing consumption, I think that we should try to induce a larger consumption of milk at present prices and let the prices follow the law of supply and demand."—C. S. B., Illinois.

"I am altogether against a process tax on dairy products. It will require an army of officers to administer this plan, and that would cost a lot of money, and many farmers would not come under this plan, so they would be worse off than now."—A. S., Wisconsin.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 3067) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La., and it was signed by the Vice President.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has read what purports to be responses to a questionnaire as to the allotment of cotton last year. Now, I wish to put to the common sense of Senators the question whether, in their judgment, what was done last year was profitable. It was a fact that there were between twelve and fourteen million bales of old cotton carried into the beginning of the new-crop year. That twelve or fifteen million bales was about the world's consumption of American cotton, had we not produced a bale. If we had not produced another bale of cotton in 1933, the world would have had an approximately adequate supply of American cotton for the year 1934.

We were confronted with an enormous surplus, and I made the proposition, and received support, I am glad to say, of the majority on the other side of the Chamber, that the Government buy that surplus at the ridiculously low price at which that cotton was being sold, and say to the farmers, "As it cost anywhere from 14 to 16 cents a pound to produce cotton, we will buy this year's supply if you will enter into an agreement with the Government to accept the cotton which we thus buy at, say, 6 cents a pound, you not to plant next year, and allow this year's surplus to be substituted for 1933 production. Then when the Government markets that cotton, under the impulse of the law of supply and demand, the difference between what the Government paid, namely, 6 cents, and what it sells it for, deducting the overhead, will be given to you."

I had the support of the economic world in that proposition, because we had a year's supply in excess of the demand and the price had gone to a point where it did not represent half the cost of production. I finally got the Government to agree that the cotton that had been bought by the unfortunate Farm Board might thus be used. I say "unfortunate", but I will add, in passing, that I believe the Farm Marketing Act was as good legislation as ever passed, although it could not survive the terrific onslaught from the organized opposition. I do not hold any brief for the members of the Farm Board or for what they did; but I say the law itself, had the farmers joined, could have been made a success. However, I did persuade the Government—Mr. Hoover did not sign the bill nor did he comment on it—to offer to the farmer the cotton it held, and which ultimately amounted to approximately 4,000,000 bales.

What did the Government do? It said to the farmers, "If you will reduce your acreage 25 percent, we will sell you any cotton that we own at 6 cents a pound—as much cotton as you would produce on the acreage that you agree to eliminate."

To illustrate, suppose I had a hundred acres and agreed to reduce that acreage 25 percent. Say, on that 25 percent, for an average of 5 years, I had made 10 bales of cotton. The Government says, "All right; we will give you an option on 10 bales at 6 cents a pound. You may plant the other 75 acres, and what you make on the 75 acres, plus what we give you an option on, will make your full crop." More profit would come from the option cotton than from the cotton I made, because the Government took it at a dead flat rate of 6 cents a pound for $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch staple grade middling, with the premiums above and all discounts below.

If cotton should go to 10 cents a pound, by virtue of taking out 25 percent of my acreage, I got the difference between 6 cents a pound and 10 cents a pound, which every farmer got, and it did not cost him a nickel; it did not cost the Government a nickel, because the advance in the price by lowering the prospect of the yield put cotton to 10 cents a pound. The Government got back its 6 cents and all overhead, and the farmer got $20 a bale on cotton which he himself did not that year produce.

Whenever a farmer himself decided that he would rather have the money than the cotton, the Government gave him anywhere from ten to fifteen dollars an acre. That was profit, because there is not a farmer in the Cotton Belt who makes ten to fifteen dollars an acre net profit. Therefore, those who said that it did not benefit the farmer, I suppose, must have said it from some insane asylum or dictated a reply there, because no man can truthfully say that it did not increase by 100 percent the profit to the farmer on the part of the crop reduced.

Now let me recapitulate. The farmer did have to sell one bale less than he would if he had planted his entire acreage, because for the amount he reduced the Government substituted cotton, pound for pound and bale for bale, from what the Government had on hand. What happened? The farmer got 10 cents a pound in place of 5 cents for what he did produce. If he had produced it within that 10 cents, he got a little profit. On the land that was taken out of cultivation, if he took the option on cotton, he made a clean profit of $20 a bale.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Am I to understand from those remarks that the Senator from South Carolina has studied and knows as much about cotton and cotton production as does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. I am just giving my experience. [Laughter.]

I see my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who collaborated with me in trying to get the Government to see how it would not cost a penny and how it would be of infinite benefit to the producer if he plowed up the cotton, the Government substituting pound for pound and bale for bale of the cotton it held; and where the producer did not elect to take cotton, then to give him anywhere from $10 to $12 an acre and, in addition to that, to let him plant on that abandoned acreage anything he saw fit for home consumption.

What idiot, what moron would not grasp at any such proposition as that where he had a dead-certain profit if the price rose at all—and by virtue of the reduction it was indicated that it would rise, and it did rise—and how could any set of men, 2,000 in number, say he did not get a benefit out of it?

Not only was the benefit manifest, because cotton rose from 5 cents a pound in the midst of the depression until today it is 12 cents a pound, $35 a bale advance in price, but what has been the report from the Bureau of Internal Revenue? By virtue of that rise in the price of cotton the income taxes have increased, according to the returns received up to the 15th of March, to the point where the Government had received back in increased income taxes twice as much as it ever paid for these benefits to the farmer.

Let us not make any mistake about it. I understand that the cotton buyer and the cotton speculator get the same profit out of a bale of cotton with cotton at 5 cents that he does with cotton at 50 cents. The ginner gets the same profit whether cotton is 5 cents or 50 cents.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. On the question of increased income taxes, was that increase from the cotton producers?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and from those who handle the cotton. There is more margin of profit in cotton that brings 12 cents than in cotton that brings only 5 cents.

Mr. FESS. My income tax this year is much higher than it was last year, and I am not a cotton producer.

Mr. SMITH. I know. The Senator is one of our well-known multimillionaires. [Laughter.] I am talking about the average somebody.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; I have not anything.

Mr. SMITH. Then the Senator did not pay any income tax.

Mr. FESS. I have not anything except my salary, but I have a good deal more income tax to pay this year than a year ago. The Senator does not mean that the increase in income tax indicates there is increased prosperity, does he?

Mr. SMITH. What is the use to cavil about this? The tax is there and the figures are there showing that more people are paying an income tax this year than before.

Mr. FESS. Since the Senator has entered upon that matter, let us get the income-tax list under the law preceding the last revision of taxes and see how many have been added to the income-tax list by virtue of the last revision, and then see how much is added to the increased taxes, rather than putting it on the ground of increased prosperity.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, I am not going into that.

Mr. FESS. No; I thought not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. The reason why I am not going into it is because up to last year, if the income rate had been revised down to zero, most of the people in my State would not have paid any tax, because they did not have anything on which to pay an income tax. This year they have.

Mr. President, I state without fear of contradiction that a crop which is exposed to ridicule and which has no attention paid to it so far as Federal legislation is concerned, that will accomplish what I have said in the way of increased income taxes, is worthy of consideration. I have been called "Cotton Ed", and it has been said of me, "He talks cotton and nothing else." But, Mr. President, cotton has held the balance of trade in favor of the United States for 70 years.

Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. SMITH. No; I am not going to yield.

Mr. FESS. Oh, please yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. No; I am not going to yield.

Mr. FESS. I want to pay a compliment to my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. As I get so few compliments, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. FESS. I simply want to state to the Senate and to my friend from South Carolina that his persuasiveness in the years past has been so great that I have voted with him on the matter he mentioned a while ago. I never in the world would have done it if it had not been for his powers of persuasion and his knowledge of cotton far beyond anything I have ever known in anyone else.

Mr. SMITH. I thank the Senator. I knew there was something good in the Senator from Ohio. [Laughter.]

In 1929 the American cotton crop of raw cotton brought $1,500,000,000, some $800,000,000 of which came from Europe and the foreign world. Think of a crop that produces $800,000,000 annual accretion to the resources of the United States. Yet we stand here and fight day after day, asking the question, what does it cost to produce cotton, when every American citizen knowing that we have a monopoly of real commercial cotton of the world should not ask the question, what does it cost to produce it, but what can we honestly and legitimately get out of it for the benefit of all American commerce?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. So far as Missouri is concerned we raise not a great deal of cotton, although we raise the best cotton in the world. Therefore I am not primarily interested in this question from the local standpoint of my State. I would like to ask the Senator whether it is not true that the rise in the price of cotton has led the way out of every depression the United States ever had in its history?

Mr. SMITH. If anyone will study our panics back as far as 1840, he will see that American cotton and the demand for it has led us out of every depression, as the Senator has stated.

Mr. President, I want to address myself for a little while to the proposition that is before us. Anyone who knows my history in the United States Senate knows that I am among the men who are most averse to Federal interference in State affairs. But we are in a condition never paralleled before in the history of America. We are suffering the birth pains of a new era. We are being born into an age that has no precedent in the history of organized civilization.

The miracles of the discoveries of science have absolutely obliterated every landmark, and caused labor conditions that are threatening the very foundations of our Government today. There has been made possible an aggregation of capital that has startled the world and threatened our financial and economic life. I know that we have to meet a brand new condition with brand new policies, radical conditions with radical policies. The situation today in reference to the cotton situation is hardly different from what it was a year ago. What was our experience?

We cut down the acreage 25 percent, and then occurred one of our phenomenal cotton years. On the reduced acreage we made almost an average crop, perhaps an average crop, not through any collusion on the part of the farmers who went into the undertaking in good faith, but because of the phenomenal weather conditions. The lint produced per acre last year was the greatest, I believe, in the history of cotton production. It may not be repeated again in years; but we did reduce the yield from an estimated 17,000,000 bales to about 13,000,000 bales.

Now, listen: When the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] introduced his bill carrying with it the compulsory feature—first he had the license feature—the Secretary of Agriculture called me in and asked me what I thought of it. I said, "I am just not going to vote for Federal compulsion in agriculture unless a majority of the cotton producers, uncoerced, unthreatened, will answer your questionnaire, and a majority of them say, 'We want a compulsory law.'" He sent out questionnaires to practically every cotton farmer in the South, and more than 85 percent said, "We want the law."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and others here talk about the hardships we are going to inflict on the farmer. You can send to the Agricultural Department and get the names and addresses of 85 percent of the cotton producers of the South who have asked for this legislation. Why? In the first place, to forestall the exigencies of the season. If the farmer who, in good faith, has entered into acreage reduction by virtue of a splendid season should make more, he should be estopped from putting it on the commercial market. The Department figured that as we will have 10,000,000 bales of carry-over on the 1st of August 1934, if we do not put on the market more than 10,000,000 bales there will be a world supply of American cotton of 20,000,000 bales. If the present rate of consumption continues, which has jumped up in the last 2 years to 15,000,000 bales, we will have at the end of the cotton years of 1935-36, 5,000,000 bales, which is only about a million and a half bales above what the trade must have of old cotton. In other words, we will practically be back to normalcy.

But 10 or 15 percent of the farmers have not signed this agreement. You will find that that was the case when they volunteered to reduce their acreage. Eighty-five percent have said, "We want to get rid of this surplus. We want a major operation to get rid of the appendix. It is threatening our lives. Let us have a major operation and cut it off."

Somebody talks about this being a permanent policy. Who in thunder wants to be operated on for appendicitis every year? We want to get rid of the appendix and get back to normal health, and go on and attend to our businesses without any further operations.

I said the farmers wanted to control themselves. Then there are men who, under the voluntary plan, will double and quadruple their fertilizer and make more on 60 percent of their acreage than they formerly did on 100 percent, or as much. There are others who will quadruple and quintuple their crop, hoping to benefit by the sacrifice of the other fellow.

What does the Government say in this respect? It says, "Are you willing for us to impose a tax, so as to put everybody in the same wagon, under the same rules, and subject to the same regulations, so that there will be no slackers or dodgers or profiteers at the sacrifice of other people, if there is a sacrifice?" And 85 percent of them say, "We are."

Now, it is just as voluntary to call upon them to bind themselves with this act as it was to call upon them to enter voluntarily into an enforceable contract that they would reduce their acreage. It is, to all intents and purposes, a voluntary thing.

What will be the result if we do not apply compulsory reduction?

I have said to my colleague the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], "I think the tax ought to be collected at the gin, for the reason that the Census Bureau down here is going to report the number of bales ginned. It is not going to report how many bales have the privilege tax on them or how many bales have not. Therefore, if they are all ginned, they will say to us, 'Oh, yes; you have got the same thing.'" Well, we cannot sell seed cotton. That is not a commercial article in the sense of ordinary commercial terminology. Therefore, collect this tax at the gin. If the man honestly makes more than he intended to make, it will not hurt him to hold that surplus and apply it on the next year's crop. It will work no hardship on anybody, for this reason: People talk about going in and by compulsion curtailing and regulating the farmer's crop. I hope this year will be the only year it will be necessary, because if we reduce the crop to 10,000,000 bales or less, a great deal is going to depend on the season. The farmers themselves have asked for it. Their requests are on record in the Agriculture Department.

Now what will happen?

The Government says to them, "We will give you 3½ to 4 cents a pound for the average amount of cotton you made on the acreage you have taken out." That is theirs. "In addition to that, you can grow on that acreage for home consumption any crop that you desire. In addition to that, we have every reason to believe that the price will go up"; so that the farmer will get more for what he does make, he will get a good profit on what he does not make, and he will have an option on nearly one half of the carry-over that we have.

Now let us recapitulate:

If the farmer cuts down, he is allotted just so many bales, which cannot exceed 10,000,000, and he will get a better price for what he does produce; he will get 3½ or 4 cents a pound for what he does not produce; and if cotton should go up, he will get his premium on the equity he holds in the 4,000,000 bales now held by the Government in trust for him. He would be an infernal fool if he did not want to get into this thing, and get in now. Mark my words: The only people who are fighting this measure are the gin men, the fertilizer people, the speculators, et al., because it does not make any difference to them whether cotton is 5 cents or 50 cents a pound, they get theirs.

Mr. President, I wanted the Senate to understand that under ordinary conditions I would not be here advocating this radical move—and it is radical—but we have as much right in this emergency to ask for radical measures to cure radical conditions as you had to name the hours of labor and the minimum price in my State. You have as much right to do this thing as you had to require the application of the doctrine of the codes and the N.R.A. We are suffering. You do not balk at that; but the minute we begin to talk about aiding farmers there are a million excuses.

Did I not come here and ask for $100,000,000 to help those who are stripped of all financial resources, who have nothing to put up as security but the prospective crop they may make? This one and that one and the other one held up their hands in holy horror that that assistance should be asked for 6,000,000 farmers whom you go in debt to every day you go into the restaurant or into a dining room. You are in debt to the farmer for the clothes you have on, for the shoes you have on, for the food that you eat; but when he comes and asks for $100,000,000 to enable all the farmers in America to stay home and make a crop, you cut it down to $40,000,000, and then the Department added such expenses as to make it unavailable even to those who can qualify with a financial statement.

Now we come here and ask you, in response to the request of 85 percent of all the cotton growers of the South, to put them all in the same category, make them all toe the same mark, and relieve us of this horrible incubus, the surplus, in order to have us in such shape that there will be no question about what will be the commercial crop.

I am no more in favor of this kind of legislation than you are except in this emergency.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. How long has it been since the cotton farmer was prosperous?

Mr. SMITH. About the year 1.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then this is not an emergency measure for the cotton farmer.

Mr. SMITH. There are degrees in damnation, as the Senator knows. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. How long has it been since their condition has been worse than it is today, under the present operations?

Mr. SMITH. Under the present operations of what?

Mr. HASTINGS. Of the A.A.A.

Mr. SMITH. It has been improving since the enactment of the law providing for the plowing up of acreage.

Mr. HASTINGS. Are they better off now than they were in the year 1929 or 1928?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Or 1927?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Which of the years has been the best of those four—1927, 1928, 1929, or 1933?

Mr. SMITH. I should say along about 1927, 1928, and 1929 the farmer was doing fairly well. He was at least living.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have been in the Senate 5 years, and my recollection is that during all of that time the Senator from South Carolina has been complaining about the farmer's condition, and I was just wondering whether he could name a year when it was satisfactory.

Mr. SMITH. I see what the Senator is driving at. We started in 1928, with the storms which desolated Puerto Rico, and swept up the Atlantic seaboard and destroyed the crops. Senator Hiram Bingham stood on this floor and asked for $30,000,000 to rehabilitate Puerto Rico. Our own people had suffered just as badly as had the Puerto Ricans. The crops were destroyed; there was nothing left; and I asked for $6,000,000 to help our own people.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it true that the Senator appeals to Congress when the farmers do not produce enough, and appeals to Congress again when they grow too much?

Mr. SMITH. If both conditions are disastrous, why should we not? Will the Senator answer that? If both of them are disastrous, and this is the only place to get relief, why should we not appeal?

Mr. HASTINGS. I suppose Congress might hope that the same disaster would not happen twice in the same year.

Mr. SMITH. I hope so, too; but under the Republican regime it happened two or three times a year. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. This is a Democratic administration. We are out of the Republican administration now. We are in a different situation.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator means we are struggling to get out. That is why I am here appealing for the farmers, on account of what has happened.

I think there are certain amendments which the Senator from Alabama will offer which will improve the bill. There is not a business in the United States that has not already felt the impulse from the rise in the price of cotton. It is impossible to have $350,000,000 to $400,000,000 of foreign capital flowing into this country without business feeling the impulse. I ask all my friends—and I have many on the other side—to view this matter from the standpoint of an emergency, and the request of 85 percent of the cotton growers to put us all in a condition where we can with assurance look for the elimination of that terrible incubus of an enormous surplus, and not let the South, through any exigencies of weather, be placed in this Gethsemane for an interminable length of time.

Mr. President, all but a few of the farmers want it, and I think that we would find an Ethiopian in the wood pile if we examined those few. I have no doubt that we would.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the Senator be willing to take out sections 2 and 3, which sections would give the President authority to extend the operation of the act?

Mr. SMITH. Frankly, I do not believe those provisions are necessary. I think that if we could confine the act to 2 years, that would be enough.

Mr. COUZENS. I think those sections ought to come out, then.

Mr. SMITH. That is my own frank opinion.

Mr. COUZENS. I should prefer to have the Senator from South Carolina come and tell us the necessity of extending the act, rather than leaving it to someone outside of Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that I have an amendment on the clerk's desk which would limit the act to 2 years.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator from Alabama why we cannot determine about the length of it, instead of leaving it to the President. I recall that when the Banking and Currency Committee had before it the proposal for the extension of the R.F.C. Act, we limited the operation of the act to March 1, 1935. In other words, we will be back at that time, and why delegate this power to an individual when we are to be here and could deal with it ourselves?

I hope the Senator will not ask that we give this authority to an individual to extend the act, or to curtail the act at any time at his will. It seems to me that the operation of this act extended for 2 years is quite enough, and that we ourselves ought to be able to determine whether it is necessary to extend the act further after that time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the only trouble about it is the difficulty of getting congressional action, which the Senator recognizes. I regard the safeguard of requiring favorable action on the plan by two thirds of the farmers as being a proper safeguard. The President then may not take action unless he is satisfied that two thirds of the farmers want to put the act into operation. If it were merely the question of a declaration by any one person, such as the President, or the Secretary of Agriculture, I quite agree with the Senator, but this measure would require affirmative action by two thirds of the producers.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, does the action by the two thirds of the producers refer to every year, or only the year 1934-35?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It applies all the time, except that for this year it has been tested. After this year there will be required a vote of two thirds of the producers to put it into operation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that I agree with the Senator from Michigan. I am from a cotton-producing State, and I do not think the Senator from Alabama should insist on that provision remaining in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is the sentiment here, I will not insist upon it. I know that some year in the future we may get a bigger surplus, and the Senators might want to apply the act. It would provide self-government for the farmers; that is all. If there is any developed sentiment here against it, I shall not insist upon it. I think it would very much strengthen the bill.

EMERGENCY AID IN EARTHQUAKE, FLOOD, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7599) to provide emergency aid for the repair or reconstruction of homes and other property damaged by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in 1933 and 1934, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator state what the bill is?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo] relating to loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for certain purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McAdoo, Mr. LONERGAN, and Mr. KEYES conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Alabama, in charge of the bill, and the Senator from Arkansas, the leader of the majority, it is now the middle of the afternoon, our correspondence is heavy, and we have been in attendance on the floor of the Senate without cessation every day since Monday in the transaction of business of great importance.

The pending legislation, in my opinion, seeks to introduce a new philosophy into the agricultural industry of this country. Few Senators have had opportunity to study it. Several Senators who are very particular about having full information on the subject before they vote have stated that they hoped we might take a recess until Monday so as to afford them an opportunity to look into the legal aspects of the matter, and to read the cases which have been cited by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from North Carolina. A great many of them have not read the debates in the House, and have not had opportunity to study the bill or read the report of the committee. In view of the situation, and the lateness of the hour, I suggest that the Senate at this time take a recess or adjourn until Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon is well worthy of consideration. I am disposed, with the approval of the Senator in charge of the bill, to move that the Senate take a recess until Monday.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Alabama, if he is to withdraw the amendment, would do so now, because some of us might not be here Monday.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw the amendment. I stated that I would.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Alabama has announced his intention of withdrawing the amendment.

I understood that the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Oregon might wish to take up a matter, but I do not see the Senator from South Carolina in the Chamber. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee has some conference reports which he would like to submit, and I will ask for a brief executive session.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in view of the urgency of action on the pending bill, the measure having been under consideration in the House of Representatives for nearly 10 days, and it being 2 months since the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate held hearings on it and reported it to the Senate, I think we ought to have some agreement, if possible, about taking a vote on the bill on Monday. So I ask the leader on this side to consider and submit such a suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think that is a reasonable suggestion. I ask unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock on Monday the Senate proceed to vote on all amendments which may be pending or which may be offered and upon the bill to its final disposition.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator knows that would require a call for a quorum. I should be willing to consider a limitation on debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I will modify the request so that after the hour of 4 o'clock on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes on the bill or any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. McNARY. If the limitation were made 15 minutes, I should have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; I will modify the request so as to make it 15 minutes rather than 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday, as I have already explained to the minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], in agreeing to the conference report on the appropriation bill for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments, there was a mistake made, for which no one is to blame. In the item of $3,000,000, in line 13, page 110 of the bill, there was substituted $2,775,000. That was not what the conferees agreed to. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the conference report was agreed may be reconsidered for the purpose of correcting that error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the conference report was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now ask leave to withdraw the report and to substitute therefor a report of the conferees with the corrected figures adopted by the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report is withdrawn. The Senator from Tennessee submits in lieu thereof another report. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the report thus submitted? The Chair hears none.

The report was agreed to as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 9, 17, 20, 28, 33, 35, and 36.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 37, 39, 42, and 43, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, in an amount exceeding $3,000 for an ambassador or a minister, and not exceeding $1,700 for any other Foreign Service officer"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That no part of the appropriation made herein shall be expended for the purchase of old buildings"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "and not to exceed $1,700 for any one person"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided, That the maximum allowance to any officer shall not exceed $1,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "not to exceed $1,700 for any person"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$165,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$3,700,000, of which not less than $200,000 shall be expended for veterans' placement service and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 1, 5, 8, 19, and 21.

CARRIAGE OF AIR MAIL BY THE ARMY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have another conference report which I desire to call up. It is the conference report on the temporary air mail bill, which was submitted several days ago. I ask that it be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report? The Chair hears none. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill

(H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "pension at the rate prescribed in part 1, Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), and amendments thereto: Provided, That in the event of injury of any such officer or enlisted man the degree of disability resulting therefrom shall be determined pursuant to the rating schedule authorized by Veterans' Regulation No. 3 (a): Provided further, That choice shall be made of the benefits provided in sections 4 and 5 of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand the nature of the report.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the conference report on the temporary air mail bill. It has been agreed to by the representatives of both Houses.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator state what happened to the amendment which I offered?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was accepted absolutely as the Senator offered it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

UNITED STATES BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to submit a brief report which emanates from the so-called "Board of Indian Commissioners" appointed by the President each year, and in connection with it I will make a brief remark.

The United States Board of Indian Commissioners was created by act of Congress on April 10, 1869, an act which provided for the appointment of 10 citizens, eminent for intelligence and philanthropy, who would serve without pay and who were commissioners to visit and inspect Indian reservations and other branches of the Indian Service and report their recommendations.

I should like to have the names of those composing the last Board of Indian Commissioners inserted in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the list of names referred to was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

United States Board of Indian Commissioners: Warren K. Moorehead, Andover, Mass.; Samuel A. Elliot, Boston, Mass.; Frank Knox, Chicago, Ill.; Malcolm McDowell, Wilmette, Ill.; Hugh L. Scott, Princeton, N.J.; Flora Warren Seymour, Chicago, Ill.; John J. Sullivan, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mary Vaux Walcott, Washington, D.C.; G. E. E. Lindquist, Lawrence, Kans.; Charles H. T. Lowndes, Easton, Md. Samuel A. Elliot, chairman; Earl Y. Henderson, secretary.

Mr. WALCOTT. The purpose of the Congress was to set up a commission of reasonable permanence, having the sanction of the Government and composed of citizens who were acquainted with Indian problems and affairs, who should scrutinize Indian legislation and administration, detect and aid in remedying abuses, assist in the difficult adjustments of the Indians to an unfamiliar environment, act with entire freedom in commendation or criticism of the plans and policies of the Government, and cooperate with the Secretary and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in all efforts toward advancing the welfare of the Indians.

In all these directions the Board has rendered a good and useful service and has aided both the executive and the legislative branches of the Government in the solution of many difficult and perplexing problems.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I did not quite understand what the Senator from Connecticut was referring to. Is he offering a resolution or introducing a bill?

Mr. WALCOTT. Neither. This is a farewell to the Indian Commission, which has served for about 50 years. I submitted the report to the former Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. He saw no objection to its being presented.

Mr. KING. No effort is being made to revive it?

Mr. WALCOTT. No effort is being made to revive it. It is a commendation of what they have done.

Representative citizens from all parts of the country—officers of the Army and Navy, presidents of colleges, clergymen, lawyers, scientists, journalists, men of large business affairs—have given diligent and disinterested service, visiting all parts of the Indian country, holding regular meetings in Washington or in the field, drafting needed legislation, conferring with the responsible executive officers, advocating policies before the committees of Congress, recommending improvements in plants and personnel, urging attention to neglected duties, watching contracts for supplies, and in many ways helping to educate the Indians in the principles, industries, and arts of a Christian civilization.

The efficiency of the conduct of Indian affairs is obviously impoverished when men like these are deprived of the opportunity of giving their official but uncompensated aid to the solution of the many problems that still confront the Government in its relations to its native American wards. It would be incredible if such a board, in its final report, did not have something to say worthy of the consideration of the Members of Congress and of the officers of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point a brief report concerning the United States Board of Indian Commissioners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM THE SIXTY-FOURTH REPORT OF THE UNITED STATES BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS FOR THE YEAR ENDED JUNE 30, 1933

Long observation and study have confirmed us in the opinion that one of the worst of the evils which afflict the dealings of the United States Government with the Indians is the superficiality and disconnectedness of the undertaking. The long history of those dealings has been a story of temporizing and postponing, of patchwork and makeshifts, of ambitious starts toward undefined goals, of half-hearted support of processes whose purposes have been quickly forgotten. The lack of a definite objective by which to judge methods and actions, the failure to visualize a comprehensive purpose behind the welter of laws and appropriations, activities, and institutions, has reduced a vast bulk of well-meant effort to futility.

In the judgment of this board the administration of Indian affairs, whether touching property, health, education, or social well-being, should all be directed toward the preparation of the Indians to be self-supporting, self-respecting citizens, ready to take their places in the normal life and labor of their native land. To this end certain legislative and executive acts are absolutely essential.

1. We again urge the passage of an act which will define an Indian and which will provide that no person of less than one-fourth Indian blood shall be eligible to continuing Federal care and supervision.

Thousands of people who have only a remote claim to an Indian inheritance are now getting benefits to which they are not entitled. Because a man's grandmother told him that her grandmother was an Indian is an insufficient reason for giving that man's children education, board, lodging, clothes, medical and dental care, at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States. Why should people with one thirty-second or one sixty-fourth of Indian blood be rated as Indians? So long as there are hand-outs coming to such people they will continue to press their preposterous claims.

2. We again urge the passage of an act to secure the codification of all the laws and treaties relating to Indians with a view to removing the present complexity and confusion.

Before any definite progress can be made in Indian affairs, the tangled muddle of acts and regulations and treaty obligations must be cleared up. This necessity has often been emphasized in the reports of this Board, but the Indian Service continues to be tied up in a smothering lot of conflicting and contradictory laws. Under such conditions it often proves that the only safe thing for an executive officer to do is to sit still and do nothing. If he moves a step in accordance with one act, he will become liable to indictment under another act. The slightest operation is charged with a score of implications or obstructed by ancient and forgotten barriers. No policy can be inaugurated or any outworn practice modified without a vast amount of floundering in the great intricate web of rules and regulations. We urge the passage of the bill providing for the codifying and simplifying of Indian law.

3. We believe that the extension over the Indian reservations of the sanitary and criminal laws of the several States is required and demanded both for the protection of society and for the welfare of the Indians.

A decent respect for law is at the root of our civilization. Why should 200,000 American citizens be permitted to enjoy the privileges of citizenship without acknowledging the duties of citizenship? Why should an Indian reservation continue to be a possible or active nursery of disease and lawbreaking? Is it not an injustice to the Indians themselves to keep them exempt from the legitimate restraints which regulate the conduct of their white neighbors? Years ago when the Indians were isolated and living in a primitive fashion, it was proper enough to let them handle their own offenders after their own customs, but now the situation is radically and permanently different. Whites and Indians are commingled. Railroads and highways cross and skirt the reservations. Thousands of Indian children are attending the public schools with the children of their white neighbors. Most Indians are living as white men live, and they are perfectly able both to comprehend and to obey the laws. It is preposterous that an Indian should be able to commit a crime and then avoid arrest and punishment just because he lives on a tract of land called a reservation. From that refuge he can defy the sheriff and the courts and the law of the State of which he is a citizen. The remedy for this outrageous situation is plain and simple. Make the laws of the State enforceable on an Indian reservation just as they are everywhere else, giving, if need be, the Secretary of the Interior authority to exempt, for the time being, the jurisdictions where he may find reason to believe that Indian life is still too primitive to make such application justifiable and appropriate. We urge the passage of an adequate law-and-order bill.

4. We advocate the gradual transfer of responsibility for the health, education, and general welfare of the Indians from the Federal Government to the care and authority of the States in which they live.

There has long been a great diversity in the matter of State and Federal jurisdiction in Indian affairs. Maine has always, in a self-respecting fashion, taken complete responsibility for the welfare of the Indians living on the reserves at Old Town and Point Pleasant. New York has long taken the major responsibility for the health and education of the 6,000 Indians living on the reservations in that State. This work is done with judicious and discriminating care by the appropriate State departments. Because of some small treaty obligations which go back into the eighteenth century, the Federal Government still maintains an agency at Salamanca, but the duties of the agent are confined to the distribution of certain gratuities provided for in these ancient treaties. The Thomas Indian School, maintained by the State for orphans or children from broken homes, is an admirable institution, ranking with the best of the Federal schools in other States. The legal status of the New York Indians is still uncertain, and an act of Congress giving the State courts complete jurisdiction is highly desirable.

In Virginia and South Carolina small bands of so-called "Indians", but of much-diluted blood, are occasionally aided by the State departments of health or education, but they have no Federal relations. In North Carolina, on the other hand, the Eastern Cherokees, living on a beautiful reservation in the western part of the State, are entirely under Federal guardianship, though many enrolled members of the tribe are living in the white communities scattered through the western counties and have practically been absorbed into the normal citizenship of the State. In Florida the few remaining Seminoles, living in scattered families in the Everglades, want, for the most part, just to be let alone. There is a Federal agent, who tries to help where he can, and State agents and public-spirited citizens of the towns and cities are usually helpful and cooperative.

The best thing that can happen now for the Florida Seminoles is the passage of the bill creating the Everglades National Park. This bill passed the Senate in the last Congress, but was held up in the House of Representatives. Mississippi some 20 years ago was successful in wishing a band of so-called "Mississippi Choc-taws" on to the Federal Bureau. This was obviously a step backward, where the Federal Government assumed responsibility for Indians who had long been taking care of themselves. Most of the other States east of the Mississippi have no Indian population and no problems. In Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota slow but steady progress is being made in developing the cooperation of the State and Federal agencies. In Wisconsin and Minnesota the State commissioners of health, education, and public welfare work with the Federal authorities, preventing duplication and promoting efficiency. Michigan might well take over the care of the scattered bands in the Lower Peninsula. Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas might well assume responsibility for the small groups of Indians who live on or about the little reservations remaining in those States. These Indians are in close contact with the white communities and, except for their exemption from taxation and their demoralizing immunity from the control of the law, they live as their white neighbors live. California has just authorized the appointment of a commission, including the officers of the appropriate State departments, to work with the Federal authorities for the welfare of the California Indians. California has a much larger Indian population than any of the other States that have thus far undertaken such responsibilities. Progress in these directions will necessarily be slower in the States which have smaller resources and larger Indian populations. * * *

5. We have always urged as one of the primary duties of the Bureau of Indian Affairs the promotion of the health of the Indians living on the reservations by the enforcement of suitable hygienic and sanitary regulations and by adequate medical and surgical service.

There has been a real improvement in the health of the Indians in the last few years and there has also been a change for the better in the hospital facilities and personnel of the Indian Medical Service, * * * but higher standards for living quarters and increased pay will be requirements to make the health work among the Indians attractive to efficient doctors and nurses who, from the very nature of their duties, must accept isolated posts in the field and forego many conveniences which are part of the ordinary life of more advanced communities. * * * A probationary service should be required of every applicant for an appointment in the Medical Service. During his probationary period he should not be assigned to independent duty but detailed as an assistant in one of the larger service hospitals. His work at his first assignment, where he is under supervision of a physician with Indian experience, should determine whether he is suited for retention as a member of the permanent field medical staff. We urge more care in making sure that physicians entering the service have had an adequate training and experience in surgery and obstetrics. The Indian Service doctor is often so situated that he cannot call in specialists for difficult or abnormal cases. He has got to operate himself. He must be able to do emergency surgery and especially handle maternity cases skillfully and confidently.

We renew our recommendation that there be established at one of the larger Indian hospitals a school for training Indian girls to be practical nurses. This does not mean that the training should be of the standard required for the State board examinations for registered nurses. There is great need in the Indian Medical Service for practical nurses and many Indian girls are well qualified for this service, both in hospitals and among their own people. * * *

The dental work of the Indian Bureau is not up to standard and leaves much to be desired. The facilities for this service should be strengthened when funds are once more available for an adequate financing of such activities.

The institution at Canton, S.Dak., where Indians suffering from mental diseases are incarcerated is not a credit to the Department. It should be discontinued as soon as better accommodations and care can be provided elsewhere. The best place for insane Indians is at St. Elizabeths Hospital in Washington, a well-managed asylum, under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. If the accommodations of St. Elizabeths are too crowded, and for any other reason are unavailable, then let arrangements be made with State institutions so that insane Indians can be cared for in the States where they live. * * * (Since this report was written the institution at Canton has been discontinued.)

6. We reaffirm our belief in an educational policy which will bring about the gradual transfer of Indian children from special and segregated schools to the charge of the public schools, but with provisions for homeless or orphan Indian children in Government boarding schools with a practical vocational and educational program.

We reassert our conviction that payments for tuition of Indian pupils in the public schools should be adjusted on the basis of the area of nontaxable lands in school districts rather than on rates fixed according to per capita costs, irrespective of the amount of lands in the possession of restricted Indians. * * *

We believe that teachers in the Indian Service should have a vestibule training in the special attributes of their work and that some acquaintance with the home life of the Indians is a necessity. A prescribed period of home visiting and study of reservation conditions should be required. For all teachers in the Indian schools, resourceful minds, Christian character, understanding of Indian peculiarities, common sense, grit, and gumption are more important than a college or normal-school degree.

We again warn against the precipitate or premature closing of boarding schools. There will be a long-time need of such schools to care for orphans, for children from broken homes or from districts remote from public schools, or from families whose nomadic life makes attendance at day schools impracticable. There should also be maintained for sometime schools where vocational training can be given and young Indians prepared for self-support in the various industries, wherein employment can be secured near their homes.

In the last 20 years no less than 52 Indian boarding schools have, for one reason or another, been closed. Some of these plants represented large investments of the money of the taxpayers, others were built by the use of tribal funds, others were old Army posts transformed into schools. We have caused a study to be made of what became of these abandoned plants.

The record is one from which certain warnings may well be taken, especially at a time when it is proposed to close more and bigger boarding schools than in any previous year. Of the 52 closed plants, 4 burned up, 6 were sold (4 of them to mission schools), 2 were transferred to some other department of the Government, 4 are used in part for local public schools, at 23—while most of the buildings are abandoned—some small units are still used for agency purposes, and 13 are not used for any purpose and are fast falling into ruin. * * * Can no values, either by sale or by use, be gotten out of these properties?

We renew our request for a consideration of the suggestion that two of the boarding schools, that might otherwise be closed, be established as special schools, one for boys and one for girls, for maladjusted young people. In almost all of the schools in the Indian Service we find the work handicapped and the morale imperiled by the presence of a small number of children who in white communities would be provided for in special schools for mental or moral defectives. Every State has institutions for the care of such cases, but Indian children of this type are scattered through the regular schools, and their presence impairs the efficiency of the school work and renders discipline difficult. For their own good, as well as for the good of the other children, these young people should be provided for in special schools or, where practicable, in the State institutions for the defective or delinquent.

7. The provision of facilities whereby Indians can secure suitable employment, and thus be more rapidly absorbed into the industrial life of the Nation, is another insistent need of the Service.

Another year of unsatisfactory employment conditions has been faced by the Indians, as well as the white citizens. The plans of the newly organized Employment Service of the Indian Bureau appear to be well devised, but we realize that at this time not much progress can be expected in a campaign of obtaining more work for the Indians. The Indian Bureau has, however, the opportunity to perfect the organization of its job-getting service so that it can function efficiently with the return of better times. No activity conducted for the welfare of the Indian has more promise than an organization the purpose of which is to take the Indian away from the old reservation life and place him on a self-supporting basis in the industries of the country.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, in whose loving arms we dwell and in whom are gathered our hopes and aspirations, hear us in this sacred moment. Be pleased to strengthen and bless us with the rapture of mutual confidence. Gracious Father, allow nothing to corrode the sanctities of friendship. We recall our personal frailties; the remembrance of them is grievous unto us. How clear becomes our vision of the helplessness of man and the necessity of divine grace. We rejoice that there is a loving Father on the throne of the universe; we beseech Thee to come and condescend to our need. Let not the successes of life exalt us, its ambitions dazzle us, its cares agitate us, nor its sorrows crush us. Be a guest in any home whose cup has been broken at the fountain and at whose hearthstone there may be heart-aching folk. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

H.R. 1—SOLDIER'S BONUS

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker: The bill now before the House for consideration—H.R. 1, soldiers' bonus—provides for the present cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the veterans of the World War. Such certificates on their face mature in the year 1945. The total number of such adjusted-service certificates is 3,550,000. Their total face value amounts to about $3,550,000,000. However, 3,000,000 veterans have borrowed from the Federal Treasury against their certificates the total amount of $1,335,000,000. The equity of the veterans in their certificates, therefore, amounts to $2,215,000,000. To put it in another way, the difference between the face value of the certificates payable by the Government to the veterans, upon the one hand, and the amounts borrowed by the veterans from the Government against these certificates, upon the other hand, amounts to $2,215,000,000, so that by the enactment of this bill the Government would pay to the veterans the net amount of $2,215,000,000, which would operate to cancel both those certificates and that debt.

This bill does not propose to pay those bonus certificates with money to be obtained by the Government by the issuance and sale of interest-bearing bonds, but by the issuance of additional United States Treasury notes to the exact amount of the equity of these bonus certificates, about $2,215,000,000.

This bill does not propose to create any new debt or liability against the Federal Treasury or Government. This bill in no sense involves the question whether there should be a liability by the Government to the veterans for adjusted-service compensation. That matter has been considered and settled by act of Congress approved by the President a few years ago, under which the Government confessed such total liability, payable in the year 1945. It follows that the only question before the House today is whether such certificates of acknowledged indebtedness maturing in the year 1945 shall be paid now in advance of their face date of maturity or whether such payment shall be postponed according to the face of the certificates until the year 1945. As further preliminary, it seems to me proper to observe that there has been for some years past annually impounded the sum of $112,000,000 raised by taxation, and a similar sum is provided by law to be raised this year and each succeeding year until the year 1945 for the redemption of these certificates at face maturity, and that it is estimated to cost some $10,000,000 to execute this law until 1945, both of which items would automatically terminate with the passage of this bill. It seems also proper to observe that interest upon the sums borrowed by the veterans from the Government against their certificates running from the year 1927 to the year 1945, the face maturity of the certificates, will practically absorb the equity of the veterans in their certificates; in which event the amounts already borrowed against their certificates will be substantially the total amount of benefits to be received by the veterans under the so-called "bonus law." I submit that when the financial conditions of the country from 1929 until the present time are considered no sane person would have expected these veterans to repay those loans out of earnings; and I further submit that the $1,335,000,000 that these 3,000,000 veterans borrowed against their certificates was the deciding factor in preventing the total break-down of our country during the winter of 1932-33 that seems in retrospect to have been the climax of this tragedy of panic and depression.

I am keenly aware of the vast propaganda against this bill that has been and is being spread over the country. No other class of citizens in America has been so unjustly criticized or so falsely accused as the veterans of the World War during this depression. It is common to read in letters and in wires and in the press the charge that there is an extensive and persistent veterans' lobby seeking some selfish class advantage of the Government. I deny such statement absolutely. No veterans or their representatives and no lobby of veterans or others in their interest have approached me upon this subject. Upon the other hand, the propaganda is wellnigh universal, emanating from those placed well in life, against the proposal to pay the veterans' certificates at this time. Instead of a veterans' lobby operating, it is, upon the other hand, those opposed to the veterans being paid their adjusted-service certificates in cash at this time who are lobbying. I denounce the charge against the veterans of the World War for lobbying as being an unprincipled libel against as splendid body of patriots as any nation in all recorded history may proudly boast; and, when analysis is made of those who by letter and wire and in the press denounce the payment of these certificates in cash, usually it is found that such persons are affiliated with large financial interests which themselves seek and often have obtained in recent times from the Government far greater financial benefits and gratuities than the veterans ask as payment of acknowledged debt.

In that connection I would ask the House calmly to ponder the vast financial benefits this Government has conferred through the Congress upon different classes of the American people during the past 12 months. Of course,

I can only briefly sketch it; and I state in advance that I am not mentioning such items as follow by way of criticism, because I myself have joined you in the granting of such assistance, but I do mention it in order to emphasize that the Congress has aided practically every group of persons and of business interests in this country during the past year except alone the veterans.

For instance: (1) By the banking bill of March 9, 1933, over $2,000,000,000 of additional currency was placed at the disposal of the banks that are members of the Federal Reserve System, by making eligible for rediscount additional collateral then in their portfolios; (2) $500,000,000 was granted outright for unemployment relief; (3) $3,300,000,000 was granted for public works; (4) $950,000,000 was granted as additional emergency relief funds; (5) the credit of the Government was extended to the extent of $2,200,000,000 in guaranteeing the bonds of the Federal farm mortgage system; (6) the Congress within the next few days will certainly further extend the credit of the Government by an additional $2,200,000,000 to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; (7) $300,000,000 was appropriated for the reforestation (C.C.C.) camps; (8) $850,000,000 was recently appropriated as additional funds for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to extend as industrial loans; (9) a great agency of the Government created by act of Congress under the name of Reconstruction Finance Corporation has, within the scope of its power, authority, and duty extended loans up to March 1934 amounting to a total of $4,786,408,947. In order that it may be clear that business in all its major forms has received from the Government financial assistance through this source, consider a partial list of the different branches of American business receiving such loans and gratuities as well as the amounts in the aggregate each class has received as loans to March 1934, that is:

- (a) To Government agencies to aid many forms of public activities, a total of $1,003,526,528.
- (b) Loans to banks and trust companies, $1,896,925,340.
- (c) Loans to railroads, $402,287,361.
- (d) Loans to mortgage loan companies, $221,272,169.
- (e) Loans to Federal land banks, $193,618,000.
- (f) Loans to regional agricultural credit corporations, $166,442,905.
- (g) Loans to building and loan associations, $114,017,920.
- (h) Loans to insurance companies, $88,587,563.
- (i) Miscellaneous, $48,674,351.
- (j) Purchase of preferred stock in banks and trust companies, $257,600,616.
- (k) Purchase of other bank securities, $192,947,150.
- (l) Loans to States and subdivisions, $299,984,999.
- (m) To Commodity Credit Corporation, for loans on cotton, $95,391,151, on corn $65,017,572; total, $160,408,723.
- (n) And many other vast and miscellaneous items.

To put it bluntly, it seems to many worthy gentlemen and many magazines and papers that it is entirely proper that the Congress enact laws under which the Government has extended vast loans and gratuities to almost every form of business activity in America, to the total extent, as I compute it, of some $17,000,000,000 during the past year, although the Government certainly owed no legal or moral obligations to a vast majority in amount involved of such loans, in order to prevent their bankruptcies and total ruin; but that it is a horrible imposition upon the unsuspecting public for the Congress, representatives of the American people, to enact that the Government shall anticipate the payment of a debt it confesses in writing that it owes to 3,500,000 veterans whom the Congress, in the heyday of their glorious youth, voted into the maelstrom of war, and who, with a fervor that did not wane and a courage that did not blanch and a success that touched the deepest emotions of the American heart, carried the flag to a glorious victory.

I do not understand such view nor share such sentiments. I have voted for each and all of these great measures under which the whole American people have carried the burden to hold up the business fabric threatened with immediate collapse, and I would do so again; but I submit that if the Congress can grant $17,000,000,000 in a year for that purpose, when it did not owe the same as a debt, we can and should anticipate a debt of $2,215,000,000 due by the Government in 1945 to 3,550,000 veterans by paying it now.

Seriously contemplate that body of facts and figures!

We have a grand total granted, given, loaned, or extended where the Government had absolutely no legal obligation amounting to a total of over $17,000,000,000; but it is now argued that the same Government cannot and must not and should not pay at this time a legal and binding written obligation to 3,550,000 of its war veterans amounting to about $3,500,000,000, upon which they have already borrowed $1,355,000,000, the interest upon which will practically absorb their equity before the due date of their certificates in 1945.

In entire candor I must say that I regard that as a false position. It would never be taken except at the instance of the selfish financial and banking interests, who, having a monopoly upon the control of money and credits that affects the interests of all of our people and determines whether there is to be prosperity or panic, insist upon maintaining the present small and inadequate volume of currency that they now control and are, hence, unwilling to set the American people free by issuance of even a reasonable volume of additional currency that will be even more sound than much of the present volume of outstanding currency. Either the financial power and the banks must keep their hands off the necks of the people, or that which Andrew Jackson did to the Bank of the United States will seem tame in history compared to what the people will soon do to Wall Street.

In letters, in wires, in magazines, in papers, in committees, and in Congress it is argued that it is financially unsafe to increase the currency above the present volume, and, hence, that it would be a tragical blunder to enact this bill which provides for an increase by $2,215,000,000 of additional Treasury notes.

These instrumentalities of propaganda and their kept agents and writers have made the most vast propaganda that the Congress has ever received against this bill. Their kept agents and kept writers and kept magazines and kept newspapers have for the past year constantly tried to convince the American people that this bill is a blunder. Everywhere such propagandists call the currency to be issued in accordance with the provisions of this bill "flat money", "greenbacks", "printing-press money", "wheelbarrow money", "baloney money", and a few other classic designations. The Wall Street propagandists, echoed by these agencies, would convince the country and have it in turn convince the Congress that the currency proposed to be issued under the provisions of this bill would be that sort of unsound money. They insistently demand only sound money. The Democratic Party, the Republican Party, the American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, the President of the United States, the leaders of both parties in the Congress, each Member of both Houses of Congress, almost each publication in America—one and all alike demand sound money. We all want nothing but sound money, but there is no common agreement in definition of sound money.

Wall Street would, by the means I have just stated, convince the country that all of the present volume of currency outstanding is sound money and that any addition to its present volume or that any new form of currency would be unsound money. Of course, those of us who have seriously considered this matter through the course of years understand perfectly that this is Wall Street's method of dealing, whereby it hopes to retain the present small and insufficient volume of seven forms of outstanding currency, because it is so small in total volume that the selfish financial interests can and actually do control it, and hence can and do actually control all credits to all the people based upon such small and insufficient volume of currency in circulation. Whether the outstanding total volume is sound or unsound is immaterial to the selfish financial groups, so long as it is small enough in total volume that they can control it and so long as it is small enough in total volume that it does not sufficiently supply the public need, so that the public must turn to them for bank credit and they, in turn, be recognized as masters of America, and thus reap the financial rewards and profits. At one time in recent years there were $65,000,000,000 of deposits in the banks in this country, of which less than $5,000,000,000 was in currency, while $60,000,000,000 was in bank credit based on that currency, for which the public paid interest to the banks. In other words, with the volume of currency in circulation so small, but within the direction and possession of the banks, they could and did multiply it twelvefold in extension of credits upon which they drew interest. That is power more stupendous than Army or Navy, for it is the power to extend or deny credits, and thus to make prosperity or produce the kind of chaos into which we have been plunged by big business and the financial interests beginning in 1929 and increasing in intensity and agony until March 4, 1933, and even yet existing in large measure in this wonderful country.

For one, I am not willing and I will not agree that the destiny of our matchless people shall be thus left in the hands and at the mercy of the financial and banking institutions of this country. But it has been thus in the past, it is thus at the present, and it will continue thus until the Congress of the United States exercises the mandate of the Constitution and its right and duty to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

I mentioned above that Wall Street and the large financial interests of the country and the banks would have you believe that all of the currency in circulation is sound money. What is a true and honest definition of sound money? By sound money is properly meant currency that may be taken to the Treasury of the United States and exchanged on demand for gold. Any kind of currency in circulation, except such as is redeemable in gold upon presentation at the Treasury, is unsound money; it is greenbacks; it is fiat money; it is printing-press money; it is "baloney money."

The country has had for many years and now has seven forms of currency in circulation. I shall next call attention to the security behind each and all seven forms of currency, and to the fact that nearly all of the currency in circulation that the financial institutions now call "sound money" because it is small enough in total volume that they can and do control it is wholly or in large part fiat money, greenbacks, "wheelbarrow money", printing-press money, "baloney money", because in only a few classes is same even promised to be paid in gold upon presentation at the Treasury.

First. As of February 28, 1934, of gold certificates there were outstanding $1,112,755,000, and those gold certificates are secured by $1,112,755,000 of gold held in the Treasury. Of course, that, indeed, is true and honest sound money.

Second. On February 28, 1934, there were outstanding $495,459,000 in silver certificates. Those silver certificates are secured by 495,459,000 standard silver dollars held in the Treasury. In other words, this one half billion dollars of silver certificates in circulation are redeemable in silver by their very terms. Is that sound money, when it does not even promise to pay in gold? Certainly not.

Third. Take the case of the national-bank notes. As of February 28, 1934, there were $984,637,000 of national-bank notes in circulation. Do the banks promise to pay them in gold upon presentation? They do not. Did the banks ever have the gold with which to pay them? They did not. Does the Treasury of the United States promise to pay that $1,000,000,000 of national-bank notes in gold upon presentation at the counter of the Treasury? It does not. Did the Treasury ever make such promise? It did not. Therefore, can any honest mind say that the national-bank notes are sound money? Certainly not; because sound money, in any true and honest definition, means currency in circulation that will be redeemed in gold upon presentation at the Treasury. And the same figures and facts and reasoning and arguments and conclusions apply now since the Gold Devaluation Act as before that act. By what are such national-bank notes secured? By gold? No; as I have just shown. But that $984,637,000 of national-bank notes in circulation on February 28, 1934, was secured (a) by $836,086,000 of United States bonds, (b) by $39,413,000 of lawful money as a redemption fund, and (c) by $99,508,000 of lawful money in a retirement fund with the Treasurer of the United States; not one dollar of gold promised or in hand with which to pay one single dollar of such $1,000,000,000 outstanding national-bank notes. Will any honest mind say that the national-bank notes are sound money, according to an honest definition of the term "sound money"? Surely not.

Fourth. On February 28, 1934, and for many years prior to that, there have been outstanding $346,681,000 of United States notes called "greenbacks." Wall Street and the great financial interests and the banks insist, it being a part of the volume of present money in circulation, that it is "sound money." By that they mean that same will be redeemed in gold, even before this country went off the gold standard a year ago and even before the recent Gold Devaluation Act, by presentation for payment in gold at the Treasury. Is that true now or was it ever true? No; because for many years past, and now, there is held in the Treasury for the redemption of that balance of greenbacks in circulation, amounting to $346,681,000, gold to the total amount of only $156,039,000. That is to say, this sound money, called "greenbacks", has 45 cents in gold in the Treasury for each $1 in circulation, and it has had that percent reserve ever since the Gold Standard Act of 1900 and no more, and yet no one in 34 years has presented a greenback for redemption in gold. So that even the greenbacks, secured by gold with special act of Congress requiring that they be redeemed in gold and with gold impounded in the Treasury for their redemption, are not sound money, because there are only 45¢ of gold in the Treasury for their redemption or payment for each $100 of greenbacks outstanding.

Fifth. Let us take the case of the Federal Reserve notes, that are universally supposed to be backed at par by gold, before the recent devaluation act and before the recent action of the Chief Executive in buying the gold of the Federal Reserve System with gold certificates. Prior to such legislation and proclamation the total outstanding volume of Federal Reserve notes was $3,224,644,000. Did that volume have a gold dollar back of each Federal Reserve dollar note outstanding? It did not. On the contrary, it was secured by (a) $35,138,000 of gold in the Treasury, (b) by $2,765,318,000 of gold pledged with Federal Reserve agents, (c) by $95,149,000 of eligible paper, and (d) by $412,800,000 of United States bonds. So that there were more than $500,000,000 of fiat money, of greenbacks, of printing-press money, of "wheelbarrow" money, of "baloney" money in even the Federal Reserve notes outstanding; and yet Wall Street and the big financial interests and their kept press and kept writers and the banks of the Nation would have the Congress believe that all of that Federal Reserve currency in circulation was sound money, as if it were backed by a corresponding amount of gold held in the Treasury.

Sixth. Take the case of the Federal Reserve bank notes. On February 28, 1934, there were outstanding a total of $222,215,000, and not one single dollar of it was based on gold. How was it secured? It was secured (a) by $1,144,000 of discounted and purchased bills, (b) by $249,774,000 of United States bonds, (c) by $12,595,000 of lawful money in a redemption fund with the United States Treasurer, and (d) by $2,471,000 of lawful money in a retirement fund with the United States Treasurer. Of course, by the term "lawful money" is meant any of the seven different forms of outstanding currency, the six forms being already mentioned and the seventh form of money in circulation which I next mention. Thus it must clearly and conclusively appear to any sane and sensible mind that each and every dollar of such total outstanding $222,215,000 of Federal Reserve bank notes are fiat money, greenbacks, printing-press money, "wheelbarrow" money, "baloney money". Not a dollar of it is founded on gold.

Seventh. The remaining form of currency in circulation is the Treasury notes of 1890, of which, on February 28, 1934, there were outstanding $1,194,000, secured by 1,194,000 standard silver dollars in the United States Treasury, each and every bit of it, under the definition of "sound money" by Wall Street and its kept agents and kept writers and the propagandists, being fiat money—in short, unsound money.

I again declare my firm conviction to you that the only reason for this propaganda in favor of sound money, trying to make it appear that the total volume in circulation of the seven different forms is all sound money redeemable instantaneously by the Treasury in gold, is to scare the country into the belief that Congress will be wrecking the financial fabric by authorizing any additional money in circulation, so that in turn the country will demand of the Congress that it desist in its effort to increase the currency in actual circulation. Of course, the less money there is in circulation the more completely the country is dependent upon bank credits, and the more completely do the financial interests control the destiny of the American people. It is equally true that a vast and unjustified volume of money in circulation would ruin the country as completely as it has been ruined by an insufficient volume of money in the recent past and at present. The task is, therefore, for the Congress, in performance of its duty under the Constitution to "coin money and regulate the value thereof", sanely to consider what is an adequate volume for the needs of our people. Wall Street and the financial interests and the banks all alike assure us that there is an adequate volume of circulating medium outstanding, and that there is abundance of money in the banks to be lent on adequate security. However, universal experience for the past 3 years is that the banks being the sole judge of what is adequate security, they have unanimously and uniformly decided that nothing is adequate security except United States bonds. It was doubtless the hope of the Chief Executive and of the Congress when Congress enacted the banking bill on March 9, 1933, that the banks, being then made free to take nearly any and all paper in their portfolios to the Federal Reserve banks and rediscount the same for new Federal Reserve notes that they could lend to the people, would avail of that opportunity and so extend loans to business and thus assist in recovery. But I submit that it is within the clear knowledge and experience of each person within the sound of my voice that the banks have done no such thing, that they have not lent, that they are not lending, and that they will not lend; and of course I believe that, so long as the Government gives the banks the opportunity to invest their funds in Government bonds, that long the banks will not aid the country along the road to recovery by extending credits.

It is a common bank assertion and a truism as well that checking accounts predicated on loans extended take the place of currency; but when no loans are made, there are no checking accounts to be based on such loans, and hence a dearth of checks to take the place of currency. I submit, gentlemen, that when the banks have the resources as in the past year, vast deposits, vast reserves, and are all practically liquid, and yet will not lend, even if they should lend so as to aid toward recovery, then a time has come when the Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional duty to provide an adequate supply of circulating medium, should not only allow a discretion with the Chief Executive whether he will increase the outstanding currency but should affirmatively enact that there be forthwith a reasonable increase of the currency. What are the people going to do for money with which to carry on the ordinary processes of business life when the banks have practically ceased to function for any purpose except to receive deposits and to buy Government bonds?

Even if the soldiers' bonus should not be paid at this time upon its merits, it affords a legal, a moral, a legitimate means of distribution of new currency among the people, without adding even one penny to the national debt. This additional $2,215,000,000 of new United States notes will be founded on gold actually in the Treasury; and when paid to 3,550,000 men scattered into every State, county, and precinct throughout the vast Nation, will give that freedom to individuals and that purchasing power necessary for the final push over this hump of depression.

There is at this hour gold in the Treasury not now backing any currency that was acquired by the devaluation of the dollar recently in the total amount of $3,146,749,000, besides other gold that has been more recently purchased. Even with $2,000,000,000 of that set aside as a stabilization fund under the recent Gold Devaluation Act, there is at least $1,200,000,000 of free gold in the Treasury which, at 40 cents on the dollar as required by the statutes as a reserve against currency issued, would be more than ample backing for all the currency to be issued under this bill, even if we were yet on the gold standard as formerly.

I call the attention of the Congress and the country to the fact that in February 1933 there was $6,545,000,000 of money in circulation, but that on a corresponding date 1 year later, that is in February 1934, there was only $5,292,000,000 of money in circulation; that is to say, there was an actual decrease from February 1933 to February 1934 of $1,253,000,000 in the money in circulation.

As further illustrative of the absolute power over the welfare and the destiny of the American people which the banks exercise, I call your attention to the fact that the high point in money in circulation in the United States was in March 1933, the very month President Roosevelt assumed the Presidency, when it went up to $7,500,000,000; and I call attention to the fact that in February 1934 the money in circulation was only $5,292,000,000, a decrease in 11 months of $2,208,000,000.

I earnestly submit to your serious consideration the proposition that if the financial powers and the banking institutions, which are private corporations incorporated under the acts of Congress, can in a period of 11 months deflate the volume of currency in circulation by $2,208,000,000, and thus retard the efforts of the administration and of the Congress to restore normal conditions of prosperity in this marvelous land, it is competent and also a plain duty for the Congress representing the entire American people under the plain mandate of the Constitution to "coin money and regulate the value thereof" to place back in circulation the identical amount thus deflated in the last 11 months without being accused of following the dangerous expedient of inflation.

Perhaps this is too serious a statement to continue at great length, but this measure before us, in my opinion, involves the fate of this Nation. In my judgment, the danger lies not in an increase of the circulating medium by $2,215,000,000, which Wall Street and its kept agents would have the country believe is inflation, but consists in the present insufficient volume of money in circulation whereby the country is starved; and in my judgment, when the Government shall cease, as of necessity it must shortly cease, to spend and lend untold billions of relief money throughout the country obtained by selling United States interest-bearing bonds, there will be a total collapse of the impetus toward recovery so far achieved unless meanwhile the Congress does its plain duty and provides the country with a reasonable additional amount of circulating medium.

The bankers have always been kind to me personally, too kind for my own welfare often, and I am not speaking in criticism of the bankers when I say that they have been buffeted so terribly in the last 4 years and are in such a state of fear and panic and apprehension that they have not lent, they are not lending, and they will not lend, and they have not contributed any considerable part toward recovery except in purchasing Government bonds; and when the Government ceases to pour out public funds in relief of distress and in employment of citizens, if the country is then dependent upon the banks to furnish credit through loans for further recovery, there is nothing but tragic disappointment and utter collapse inevitable. I beg you gentlemen to consider and reflect upon these matters, because to my mind they appear to be axioms. That tragical consummation can be prevented if Congress will do its duty and provide the country with a reasonable additional volume of currency, for which distribution can more sensibly be had by paying this bonus in cash now as provided by the bill under present consideration than in any other way yet devised.

The total gold held in the Treasury this day is in excess of $7,500,000,000. From that total deduct the stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000, and that would leave a balance of $5,500,000,000. Such amount of gold will, according to all banking practice, all expert opinion, and all human experience, safely support a total of $12,500,000,000 of currency on the statutory 40-percent gold-reserve basis under the Federal Reserve Act of 1913. Even if the total amount of all seven forms of paper money outstanding were Treasury obligations redeemable in gold, which they are not, and if we were yet upon the gold standard, and even if the Treasury were under obligation to pay in gold each dollar of the national bank notes and the Federal Reserve bank notes and all of the other forms of "baloney" and fiat and green-back and printing-press and "wheelbarrow" money now outstanding, there is gold enough in the Treasury to do so and also to support the additional issue required by this bonus bill, under the 40-percent gold-reserve requirement.

From such total $12,500,000,000 possible to be safely and legally issued, if there be deducted the total outstanding currency of each and all seven sorts as specified in my remarks amounting as of this date to $5,292,000,000 in circulation, as shown by page 95 of the Federal Reserve Bulletin for February 1934, it clearly appears that an additional amount of over $7,000,000,000 may safely be issued under the 40-percent gold-reserve requirement. However, no such vast additional amount is necessary or is required or is desired, and instead of such $7,000,000,000 additional that is legally possible this bill calls for only $2,215,000,000 additional.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I claim no greater devotion than other gentlemen to the proper welfare of the veterans of the World War, but I yield to no other gentleman unless he was a soldier in that war in devotion to them and their welfare. I was a Member of this body in 1917 when the World War was declared. I was the second Member of this body to declare for that war, the able and brilliant Mr. Gardner, of Massachusetts, being the first. I was the very first Member of this body then to declare for the selective service system of forming that Army, called the draft system. I voted for each appropriation necessary to conduct that war to its final conclusion. I made trip after trip to the ports to wave the young patriots farewell upon their glorious adventure. I made trip after trip to the ports to welcome those who returned to this blessed land. Day after day we of the House and of the Senate who had taken that same position stood before the maps upon the wall in the lobby and gazed at the lines showing the gradual forward movements of those noble young fellows. Our hearts swelled with tender and affectionate pride when our young patriots arrived in France, and went immediately into action, and never turned their backs to the foe. We watched that line waver, but we never saw it break. In our minds and feelings we lived as nearly as possible with them day and night in the trenches, in the hell of shot and shell and poison gas. Their indifference to danger and death, their youthful ardor and enthusiasm under the worst conditions, their perfect courage under fire in the hardest battles, their uncomplaining resignation to sickness, wounds, disease, and even death suffered for the Stars and Stripes, and their manly conduct after victory, place them in the true category of the immortals.

I grieved with the parents when reports reached me and I communicated same to them that this and that son had paid the price of patriotism and had achieved the distinction of the ultimate sacrifice. We left some 100,000 dead upon the fields of war. When they broke the Hindenburg line that no other soldiers had more than dented, my emotions were like the emotions of other patriotic Americans in exultation at their deeds of daring and of valor. When they came back to the shores of America one universal heart throb of pride and joy possessed our people. Whether descendants of heroic Union soldiers who remained in the North and East or had migrated to the golden West or whether descendants of heroic Confederate soldiers who remained in the land of sunshine and chivalry in the ancient South, wherever they went a united people poured out the blessing of their benediction upon them. The years have passed, and they are no longer in the heyday of glorious youth. Due to no fault of their own, multitudes are in distress and their spirits are darkened, life to multitudes is no longer glamorous, stern reality and suffering have tempered and sobered and saddened; and now they wonder, when they know their services were patriotic, their sacrifices great, their impulses right and their citizenship good, and that they have demanded little and received less of the Government they protected in their glorious youth, why they are held up to ridicule by the great and powerful and their satellites because merely they ask their Government to anticipate a debt the Government in writing confesses it owes them.

I earnestly believe this bill should pass. I earnestly hope it will pass the House and the Senate and be approved by the President. I want to see those splendid fellows in a solid phalanx parading under the flag again with the renewed feeling in their hearts that they did not fight in vain and that ingratitude of those who stayed at home is not to be their portion. I want to see their lives brightened, their families made more happy, justice done, joy and sunshine take the place of gloom and darkness; and by the passage of this bill I want them to know that the heart of the American people goes out to them now in their time of depression in remembrance and in affection and in gratitude for the deeds they performed in their glorious youth to the honor and glory of our beloved country.

A C.W.A. COUNTY ADMINISTRATOR GETS FIRED

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, what is the matter with Mr. Albert J. Burnham, editor of the Roger Mills County News? He has recently taken me to task in an article published in his paper. As a rule I do not pay any attention to this kind of criticism; but when a person rants, as he is now doing, the public is entitled to know what is wrong. He was recently fired as C.W.A. county administrator. He had a good job and lost it, after an investigation was made which showed that men paid out of the C.W.A. funds were required to perform labor in connection with the printing plant and for other acts that were out of line. Anyhow, affidavits to this effect were filed with the honorable Carl Giles, State administrator.

Did you ever see a fly that had been caught in a spider's web—how it kicks and jumps around for just a little while? He knew that President Roosevelt announced a policy asking that politics be kept out of public relief and C.W.A. activities. He knew that Members of Congress provided the legislation that set aside the money to be used for this purpose; yet, instead of obeying the President, he insisted in using the columns of his paper to publish statements about me that were either untrue or misleading, and every reader of his paper will remember that he has been doing this for many months.

He thought his position was secure and that he could continue to do as he pleased. To say the least, if he had not been so sure in thinking he could do as he pleased, he might now be holding down the position that was taken away from him. He was warned about using his paper to play politics and in promoting the candidacy of others while serving as head of the Civil Works Administration. I have it from the highest authority that he made a desperate effort to keep from being fired, but he continued until Mr. Giles, in order to carry out the policy announced by President Roosevelt, felt that all that could be done was to put someone in charge who was interested in the welfare of the poor unfortunates who need employment and in addition would stay out of politics. There is an old adage: "A man generally reaps what he sows." Brother Burnham got exactly what he invited.

Up to the present time I have never written a single county administrator asking that anyone be given special consideration; on the other hand, I have been interested in securing a sufficient amount of funds to take care of those who are deserving; and being a supporter of the President, I was willing to do exactly what was recommended as to not playing politics with matters that affect the livelihood of poor unfortunates. How much better it would have been for Mr. Burnham if he had done likewise.

I have always noticed that when a person reaches the place in life where he thinks he is smarter than the other fellow that usually he is riding for a fall, and Mr. Burnham's experience in being fired for playing politics and mishandling funds under his control will, I hope, be a lesson to him in the future.

As to his criticism of me for giving recognition to my friends, instead of my opponents, I have no apology to make, as a person who will not stick with his friends cannot last long in anything. I do not believe that any fair-minded person would expect me to do otherwise; anyhow, every individual that has been appointed by me to render service to the district was authorized by a resolution which was unanimously passed at a joint convention held at Elk City, Okla., composed of county chairmen, congressional officials, and officers of the League of Young Democrats. This is the highest party authority that can be given in a district.

I am proud we have the kind of President who is doing his level best to restore this Nation to normalcy. He may make some mistakes, and would not be human if he did not, yet it is always to be deplored that a person acting for him should be found unworthy of trust, and I feel very sorry for Mr. Burnham, who did not obey orders and, of course, had to be relieved of his responsibility. I hope it will not be necessary for me to reveal other facts that relate to the mishandling of funds under his jurisdiction, as I prefer to let the dead rest in peace. Anyhow, he is at liberty to go ahead and sponsor the cause of anyone whom he may desire, and I will take my chances by standing with the President in his great program of recovery.

HOUSE RESOLUTION NO. 238

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST], providing for a fair and impartial investigation of the House restaurant by a committee composed of Members of this body. I think it is due to the House and the country that the committee be appointed and the investigation be made.

Furthermore, I hope the resolution may be adopted unanimously so that in our deliberations here we may give evidence of a sincere, earnest desire to compose the turbulent issues that have arisen over the restaurant, to the end that the country may have confidence that the final settlement of the controversy, whatever it may be, will be on a basis of exact justice to all the citizens of this Republic.

I cannot conceive of any reason why any Member of this House should oppose the adoption of this resolution, whatever his views may be on racial questions. The resolution does not fix any policies or promulgate any decrees. It simply provides in the good, old-fashioned American way that we shall have an open and aboveboard investigation by a committee of five Members to be chosen by the Speaker, toward the end of reaching a final understanding on a basis of fairness and justice toward all people. That is the tempo of the resolution; and I believe that under the unfortunate circumstances which have arisen and the atmosphere that now surrounds this controversy, it is best that we adopt this resolution at once and proceed to the investigation. The interests of the country require that something be done to prevent a repetition of the riotous scenes that occurred in this Capitol last Saturday.

There was a great deal said in the speech made by Mr. DE PRIEST to the House on last Wednesday that I thought was admirable. It is true as gospel, as he stated, that among the colored citizenry of our country, comprising 0.1 of our entire population, communism has never taken root. It is true, as he stated, that when it comes to loyalty to our institutions, when it comes to giving their lives, if necessary, that the ideals maintained in our cherished Constitution may go on and on, blessing future generations, the colored people have always been "on the square with this Government." They do not entertain treasonable suggestions, they do not commit sabotage against the Government, they are true and loyal to America, and when the time comes to fight for home and country they are as brave soldiers as ever served this Republic. All of this was stated by Mr. DE PRIEST more impressively than I could state it, and he spoke truly. I believe, as he believes, that an element of our population that has such a clear record of loyalty and service to the country in peace and in war is entitled to its "just rights under the Constitution."

I thought Mr. DE PRIEST spoke in a high strain of patriotism when he said:

I have repudiated communism everywhere. I think it is un-American; it is against our form of government; and whatever complaint I have to make against the treatment of my people, I am willing to stay here and fight it out with you and not try to destroy our form of government.

I do not believe that in his heart the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is at all opposed to this investigation. In his frank, clear, and well-tempered address to the House on March 23, he said:

It is a matter of utter indifference to me. I am always ready to meet, and to meet squarely, any issue that ever arises here in this body, but it is entirely up to the Members of the House to settle this whole thing according to both their desires and their tastes.

Mr. WARREN has made a financial success of the restaurant. His record in that respect is most remarkable. He has accomplished what a long train of predecessors could not do, by abolishing deficits in that establishment, and for the first time the restaurant is on a paying basis, so that, as far as the future reveals, it will no longer have to be sustained by Federal appropriations. For that notable achievement Mr. WARREN deserves much credit. I entertain the hope that he will agree to this investigation. The restaurant is a public institution. In the past its deficits—and they have been many—have been paid from funds derived from taxation of all the people, and its management should be conducted on a basis of absolute fairness to all our people.

I hope this investigation, when it is made, will result in the establishment of permanent rules for the restaurant and in an understanding that will settle this controversy satisfactorily for all time, and I hope it will be made soon. All Members of the House, North, South, East, and West, should vote for this resolution, and I see no reason why its adoption should be delayed until April 9 when the vote on discharge of the committee would be automatic under the rule. Let us join together and adopt it now and proceed with the investigation.

SENATE AMENDMENT 22 TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES BILL

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record, and to include therein replies I sent to telegrams received from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the United War Veterans, and the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, in order that I and the other Members of the House might have exact information concerning the stand on the Senate amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill, I sent the following identical telegram to the national headquarters of each of the following veterans' organizations: Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, United Spanish War Veterans, and the American Legion:

Expect Senate amendments 14 and 22 before House Thursday. Wire me position Veterans of Foreign Wars.

I received the following replies, all dated March 22, 1934:

Answering your telegram, Steiwer-McCarran amendment acceptable to Veterans of Foreign Wars.

JAMES E. VAN ZANDT.

Answering your telegram, Spanish War Veterans are more concerned as to the policy under which they receive benefits from Congress than the amounts they receive. Taber amendments, because of certain unfair provisions, are unsatisfactory. Steiwer-McCarran amendment, so far as it affects Spanish War Veterans, is acceptable. You may use this telegram as you deem best.

RICE W. MEANS,

Chairman National Committee on Legislation,
United Spanish War Veterans.

MY DEAR MR. MCGRATH: This will acknowledge receipt of your telegram requesting a statement as to the position of the Disabled American Veterans on the present legislative situation.

In reply, I would outline our position as follows:

1. The Disabled American Veterans feel that this session should not adjourn without reenacting practically all provisions of the old World War Veterans' Act so far as they concern the service-connected cases.

2. The Disabled American Veterans feel that the immediate action should be for the House to concur in the Steiwer amendment as it passed the Senate.

3. While we know of no one, speaking with authority, who has stated that the President would veto such a bill, persistent rumors to that effect should not, in our judgment, prevent Congress from performing its duty in the way of legislating to correct the cruel injustices which Senators and Representatives have had an opportunity to view in their home districts during the year that has elapsed since the enactment of the hysterical bill of last March.

4. Should the much-propagandized veto be returned, Congress should continue to do what it thinks is correct by overriding such a veto.

5. Should there be a veto and developments be such that it cannot be overridden, both branches, in our judgment, should, through existing committees, give deliberate thought to this whole vast problem and then vote on the committee reports in the regular way.

I take this opportunity to call your particular attention to two outstanding features of this whole situation.

During the past year every cross-section of Americans, from charwomen to industrial magnates, has had its full day in court in the discussion of every phase of the agreements covering their lives, with the single exception of the man disabled in the Nation's defense. Again, the most conclusive proof that the precipitous action of a year ago was not justified is shown by the fact that, during the past year, approximately 50 changes by law and Executive order have already been made in the act, and it is manifest that other changes are imperatively needed.

Most respectfully,

JOE W. MCQUEEN,

National Commander Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your telegram, it is our opinion that if the House recedes and concurs in the Senate amendments relative to World War veterans, the bill that will go to the President will be vetoed. In which event the veterans will obtain nothing by way of legislation.

The House amendments contain substantially three points of the American Legion four-point program. A vote for them would at least be an effort to provide relief for the war disabled, which is the object of the American Legion.

We respectfully request that you lend your aid and assistance in seeing that the House does not take this action, but that the House insists upon its own amendments relative to World War veterans. We are convinced that if the bill goes to the President with the House amendments, it will be signed.

I am, very truly yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee American Legion.

It will be noted that all of the organizations except the American Legion stand squarely behind the Senate amendment. I would also call to your attention the statement in the first paragraph of the letter from the American Legion that their reason for supporting the Taber amendment rather than the Senate amendment is based solely upon the assumption that the Senate amendment would lead to a veto.

I have listened carefully to the discussion, and I have consulted every available source of information. I have received no definite assurance that either amendment will or will not lead to a veto at the hands of the President.

I will stand upon my own opinion that the Senate amendment, in spite of its defects, comes closer to giving justice to presumptives with real disability, with war-time origin, to Spanish-American War veterans, and to actually disabled emergency officers with service-connected disabilities.

I continue my support of the Senate amendments, thus fulfilling my promise that I would do my best to correct any injustices which might develop under Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

MR. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under the question of the privilege of the House, I want to call attention to the editorial appearing in yesterday afternoon's Washington Times in large box-car letters headed, "Federal Pay Cut Tricksters Cannot Prevail Forever." It states—

MR. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas is going to call the matter up under the question of the privilege of the House, the gentleman should present a resolution.

MR. BLANTON. I shall in a few minutes, if it becomes necessary.

MR. SNELL. It should be presented in the regular way.

MR. BLANTON. I did not want to take so long as that.

MR. SNELL. If the matter is of sufficient gravity to be considered as impugning the action of the House, it should be presented in the regular way.

MR. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think it impugns the House when it refers to Members as pay-cut tricksters?

MR. SNELL. I should think so; but I think it should come up in the regular way.

MR. BLANTON. I did not want to take up an hour's time.

MR. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

MR. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is well known to every posted person that the President of the United States has insisted that not more than the amounts proposed by the House respecting restoration of pay cuts shall be granted, and that the fight made by administration leaders in this House on the subject of pay cuts has been in support of the President and his policy and program.

Yet, covering the entire top half of the editorial page of his Washington Times yesterday afternoon, printed in large box-car letters, Mr. William Randolph Hearst carried a slanderous editorial, stating:

The trickery and parliamentary maneuvering with which skillful politicians are delaying and frustrating the efforts to restore Government salaries are worthy of opponents of decency.

Why has it been necessary to resort to trickery to delay and heckle this measure?

It has been necessary to resort to such tactics because only by their use could fair-minded and honorable Members of the House and Senate be prevented from the prompt enactment of a provision which embodies one of the essentials of economic recovery.

Only by such tactics could the present inconsistent position of the Government on the matter of purchasing power be maintained.

The friends of decency, however, have one consolation, and that is that trickery cannot prevail forever.

The above is an uncalled for, inexcusable, slanderous attack upon the President. It was the President's program and policy which the administration leaders of the House were fighting to uphold. The President personally requested the House to take such action.

There has been no trickery. There has been no inconsistency. There are over 300,000 Government employees now getting high salaries. The fight has not been to restore salary cuts respecting the low salaries. The fight has been to restore salary cuts to all salaries. Every time there has been a vote taken in the House there has been a majority of the Members voting to sustain the President. On the last vote we took the other day there was a majority of 46 votes sustaining the President's position. So the House of Representatives is with the President and not with Mr. Hearst.

For about a month, daily, the Hearst papers in Washington have been criticizing the House for not restoring all salary cuts. Every day in editorials printed in large box-car type covering the top of the front page Hearst papers here have cast slurs and criticisms because the House of Representatives has loyally supported the President.

I call attention to the fact that of all men on earth to take this position, William Randolph Hearst should be the last, for I am reliably informed that he first cut his employees' wages 10 percent and later cut them another 10 percent—a 20-percent cut to his employees. William Randolph Hearst ought to get his own house in order before he says a word about taking public money out of the Treasury to pay to Government employees. He ought to make a full restoration of salary to his own employees instead of compelling them to work under a 20-percent cut, as I am reliably informed is the case.

What is the purpose of William Randolph Hearst in this matter other than to sell a few newspapers in Washington? Is it a party matter with him? Is he a loyal Democrat? Is he a dependable party Democrat? I do not think he is. He never runs his paper in the interest of the Democratic Party or of the Democratic administration. Is he a loyal Republican? Has he ever fought your Republican battles for you? I think he is a mugwump, with his mug on one side and his wump on the other. [Laughter.]

AIR MAIL

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the pitiful plight of the Army pilots who are flying the air mail, and the enlisted men engaged in this service.

One thousand two hundred men in this service are not receiving enough money on which to live properly. Many of them have lost weight during this time of nonpayment. It is a very pitiful condition. It is just another example of the hardship that has been worked upon our Army men, as well as upon the air public, through the cancelation of the air-mail contracts.

I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that something will be done to remedy this situation. I have introduced a resolution to pay these men. It should be passed immediately. It does not seem fair, it does not seem just that Uncle Sam's men should not have enough to eat; and I understand this has been the condition.

How long, Mr. Speaker, must the innocent pay for the alleged guilty? It is conviction without a hearing. If guilty, the air-mail firms should be punished at once, not the taxpayers and the innocent Army pilots, 11 of whom went to their death. The other Army pilots, because of lack of per diem allowances, are sent hungry on their most hazardous tasks. Why does not the administration pay its debt at once to the living; it can never pay its debt to the dead? Congress must act, as the administration will not.

A great many letters come to me, Mr. Speaker, from the air-mail public stating that although 8-cent stamps are put on their letters they are not receiving air-mail service. The air mail should again be carried by commercial companies.

I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that something will be done to restore at once the air mail to commercial companies. Forty-six commercial pilots have been employed by the War Department to fly the air mail, another proof that the Army was not prepared to take over this work.

Just today I was talking with an officer concerning Army aviation training. He was a reserve pilot. He stated that in his 2 weeks of alleged training in the summer to fly Army planes he had received but 3 hours' actual flying experience.

The administration wrote for the Army pilots c.o.d.—a code of death, Mr. Speaker.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to approach the discussion of this bill from a little different angle than that of those who have preceded me. In spite of what was said yesterday by the very distinguished and brilliant gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], I think there are profound possibilities for the promotion and preservation of world peace in the reciprocal trade provisions authorized by this bill. The greatest peacemakers in the world are the merchants and traders of the various nations who buy and sell with one another. I once heard Baron Shibusawa, the great Japanese statesman and business leader, say in discussing the possibility of war between his nation and ours:

Most wars result from the ambitions and mistakes of statesmen and warriors; but because of the mutual benefits and the kindly relations and community of interests that grow out of friendly and profitable trade, it is possible to weave a bond of friendship between nations so strong that neither the warrior nor the statesman can break it.

In the face of the new doctrine of national isolation and self-containment that is being urged as a part of our preparation for the next world war, it is refreshing to note that President Roosevelt's message asking for this bill met with immediate and favorable response, both at home and abroad.

We have listened to several quotations from a speech by the Honorable Ogden Mills, but I want to read a few quotations from the real molders of public opinion—the press.

That great Republican newspaper, the New York Herald Tribune, of March 17 last, in an editorial upon the bill under consideration, said:

The principle of reciprocity agreements has much in its favor. It has an old Republican lineage. Members of that party in Congress who now oppose it reveal a willingness to drive opposition to absurdity. The most that they can reasonably demand is that the President's powers be properly circumscribed. The Nation needs reciprocal trade agreements more than it needs the tariff as an issue in the next congressional campaign.

At a meeting of business executives at New York City on March 13 last, Col. Robert McCormick, editor of the Chicago Tribune, the leading Republican newspaper of the Central West, urged "full support of the administration program for developing foreign markets." Colonel McCormick proposed an immediate beginning on the foreign-trade expansion program, and said:

While I have not been authorized to speak for anyone but myself, I know the minds of my fellow editors. I know they are just as eager to develop foreign markets as I am, * * * with great benefit to ourselves and great benefit to those abroad.

At a national conference of farm editors lately held at Washington, D.C., the following resolution was adopted:

It is our conviction that neither American agriculture nor the American people as a whole can prosper adequately without perpetual effort to protect and enlarge our foreign markets, and to this end we urge that the utmost utilization be made of all practicable forms of reciprocity and international readjustment.

From far-off Chile at the moment of the President's proclamation on this matter comes the following:

SOUTH AMERICA ACTS TO SET UP TRADE ALLIANCE [Chicago Tribune Press Service]

SANTIAGO, CHILE, March 16.—Another and a more important step toward the goal of a South American economic alliance was registered at the first conference of continental chambers of commerce, which met recently in Valparaiso.

Whether or not the United States is associated with the newly developing policy will depend a good deal on Washington. Nevertheless it was indicated that the Latin-American traders are more friendly disposed toward the United States by the ringing cheers for President Roosevelt's reciprocal trade overtures.

CONTINENTAL CUSTOMS UNION

It is considered that the conference of chambers of commerce will be the starting point of many trade treaties. These negotiations must inevitably lead up to the realization of the aspiration common to all—a continental customs union.

From Brazil comes the following, and this also is taken from the Chicago Tribune:

Trade relations with Brazil are used as a specific illustration in suggestions for the development of foreign trade.

IMPORTS OVERWEIGH EXPORTS

The United States buys about 45 to 50 percent of Brazil's total exports, and the volume of our imports from Brazil is about three times as great as our exports to that South American country.

So we see that in the great Republic to the south of us there is a wide-open opportunity to expand the sale of American products.

From Italy comes this dispatch:

ITALY READY TO TRADE WINE AND SILK FOR UNITED STATES COTTON, MOVIES

ROME, March 16.—An exchange of Italian wine and silk for American cotton and films was suggested by experts today as a possible basis for an increase in trade between the two countries.

I could go on reading many more favorable quotations, but those read are sufficient to show the trend of public opinion both here and abroad.

Customs duties were originally levied for the support of governments. So-called "protective tariffs" were first advocated as a means to help infant industry, but in America the infant soon grew to be a giant. Next it was claimed that high tariffs were necessary for the protection of labor. But investigation showed that protected monopolies resisted every attempt to pass on to labor its share of tariff profits. American workmen have always had to organize and fight to win American standards of living and fair wages for themselves.

Prohibitive-tariff advocates now demand it because its beneficiaries need the money. They would make rates high enough to destroy competition. Trade barriers and embargoes are being set up between nations everywhere, and behind these walls the consumer pays the price that monopoly demands. The result of this policy has been the destruction of world trade, idle factories, abandoned farms, unemployment for millions of men, and tremendous losses to the national income.

A program of reciprocity and friendly trade agreements was never more needed than today. This bill is a part of the President's great program for business recovery. It is another bold stroke in his efforts to restore national prosperity. He asks for authority and power to battle for the recovery of our lost markets and to rebuild our trade with other nations. At the same time he promises to protect American industry and agriculture.

World trade is just what its name implies—an exchange of commodities between individuals and nations. Only trade balances are settled with money. We cannot sell unless we buy. There were no surplus problems to trouble American producers until tariff barriers between nations killed our markets for American products. It is un-American to put a penalty upon production. It can only be justified in a national emergency. The farmer or manufacturer who produces a surplus of useful commodities is promoting his own and his nation's prosperity and benefiting mankind.

Take my own case, for instance. I run a ranch out in Nebraska. If I did not produce on the farm more than I consumed I would be no better than the Indian that had lived there before me. It is necessary to produce a surplus in order to bring prosperity, either to the individual or to the Nation, but you must find a market to sell the surplus, and that is what we are empowering the President to do for us by this bill.

During the World War period trade barriers were broken down, demand and production were permitted an open field in which to operate, and world trade swelled to more than $50,000,000,000 annually. This great volume of world commerce warranted hopes that the gigantic war debts might be paid. Prices and production of both manufacture and agriculture were on a basis that permitted honorable liquidation of both national and private debts rather than the disaster and disgrace of general bankruptcy. But a spirit of intense nationalism grew out of the prejudices of the great war. Nations began to erect tariff barriers against each other and each sought to keep the profits and benefits of world trade and prosperity to itself and to deny to others their share.

This war psychology and policy of national isolation has prevailed until world trade is only one fourth of what it was from 1920 to 1930. Not only has world commerce been killed, but internal prosperity has sickened also. Millions of men have lost employment because the markets for their products have disappeared. World trade has shrunk from fifty billions annually to less than fifteen billions. Our foreign trade with other peoples has fallen from $5,000,000,000 annually to something like a billion and a half. Under these conditions, unsalable surpluses have piled up, labor is looking for bread with which to live, and thousands of bankers, farmers, and business men are bankrupt. This bill will give the President power to wrestle with this problem.

There can be no permanent economic recovery until both foreign and domestic trade is revived. Profitable prices cannot long be maintained by enacting laws that heap increasing burdens upon consumers and taxpayers. We can bolster prices and inflate credit with Government loans, but notes and bonds must be paid and interest works night and day against the borrower. What the American people need is not the ability to borrow more money, but a price for our products that will enable us to pay what we have already borrowed.

To secure better prices we must build broader and better markets. American farmers and manufacturers are the most efficient in the world. They can win back the markets we have lost if permitted a free opportunity to do so. By this bill we are giving the President the power with which to win this opportunity for us. During the decade from 1920 to 1930, when we sold annually five billions of surplus products to other peoples, 40 percent of that trade was from the farm and 60 percent from the factory. We sent our surplus products north and south to the countries of this hemisphere, we sent them eastward across the Atlantic to Europe, we sent them westward beyond the Pacific to the Orient, and with them we laid hold upon the money and the commerce of the world, and we swept it across these mighty seas and poured it into the lap of American industry; and because of this great tide of trade and commerce, we became the happiest, the most prosperous, and the richest people upon the face of the globe.

It is to restore those happy days that your committee comes to the Congress with this reciprocal trade bill. It is a testimony of our faith that we can rebuild what has been torn down. It gives life to those policies of reciprocal trade taught by Blaine, by McKinley, and by Wilson. Speaking on this subject in 1921, President Wilson said:

Clearly, this is no time for the erection of high trade barriers. It would strike a blow at the successful efforts which have been made by many of our great industries to place themselves on an export basis. It would stand in the way of the normal readjustment of business conditions throughout the world, which is as vital to the welfare of this country as to that of other nations.

Embargo protectionists object to this bill because they fear the President will reduce tariffs to the injury of American producers. There is no warrant for that assumption. The American people have confidence that the President will only use the powers conferred in this bill to promote American trade and prosperity and give added employment to American labor.

Some say the bill gives the President too much power to control tariff. The tendency of high tariffs is to create private monopolies. Monopoly for profit is intolerable and indefensible. When once monopoly gets its hold upon the earnings of the people it requires drastic legislation to shake it loose. James G. Blaine was a great apostle of commercial reciprocity between nations. His defeat for the Presidency was a greivous disappointment to Robert G. Ingersoll, the matchless Republican orator from Illinois, who nominated Blaine in a great speech. Ingersoll was a Democrat before he was a Republican and he was always a liberal on the tariff.

After Blaine's defeat a man in Peoria, Ill., where he lived, went to him and said: "Mr. Ingersoll, I cannot understand the tariff. It is too deep for me, but you have the gift of language; you think clearly upon anything to which you direct your mind; you can explain a thing so simply and so plainly that anybody can understand what you mean. I wish you would explain the tariff to me."

Mr. Ingersoll said: "I can explain it best by telling you a story. There was once an old man named 'Uncle Sam', who had a big family of boys. The oldest of his sons he named 'agriculture', the strongest and most industrious he called 'labor', a great big hungry fellow who could never get enough to eat he called 'consumer', and so on, down through his numerous family until his youngest child was born, the Benjamin of the family, and he named this promising infant 'industry.' 'Uncle Sam' looked at little 'industry' and said, 'He is not as big and strong as his elder brethren; I will have to feed him better than I feed them.' So he began to take away from 'agriculture' a portion of that which he dug by toil out of the land. He took from 'labor' a portion of what he earned by the strength of his arm and skill of his hands. He robbed the 'consumer' of a lot that belonged to him, and from the portions that he took from his elder brethren he mixed an infant food and he called it the 'tariff', and he began to feed it to little 'industry.' Under the inspiration of this marvelous food the child began to grow, he grew very rapidly, and the first thing 'Uncle Sam' knew here was his head sticking out of the cradle at this end and his feet way down there.

"'Uncle Sam' looked at him and said, 'I don't need to rob his brethren any longer to feed this big fellow, I'll let him take care of himself.' Instantly the child showed he could do so. He stood upon his feet. Behold, he had grown bigger than his father. The infant, 'industry', had become the giant, 'monopoly', and he said to 'Uncle Sam', 'Old man, keep on feeding me just as you have done or I'll knock your head off.'"

And said Mr. Ingersoll, "Uncle Sam was afraid, and he has been feeding him ever since."

With the decline of our world trade, Government receipts from customs duties have declined to an almost negligible amount. For 1929, receipts from customs duties were $600,000,000 plus. For 1932 they had declined to three hundred and twenty-six millions, and for 1933 fell to the low level of only $250,000,000.

For the decade from 1920 to 1930, when our world trade totaled four or five billions annually, the Treasury profited greatly, as well as industry and agriculture. Farm surpluses then consisted of money in the bank and cash in the farmers' pockets. Manufacture and commerce were busy supplying the commodities that farmers and laboring men were anxious to buy. A man once said to me, "When men have money, they humor their tastes." When the farmer has money in his pocket, he buys the products of industry and labor.

When our world trade was at full tide, cotton sold at 20 cents per pound on the southern farm, western wheat at $1.50 per bushel, fat hogs at $10 per hundred, and fat cattle at even a better price. Tobacco was double the present price and butterfat and other dairy products were 100 percent higher than at present. No wonder that under such conditions our banks were full of money, our stores were crowded with buyers, the wheels of industry were humming, and production was at high pressure in all lines of manufacture.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman referred to the exportation of wheat. I call the attention of the gentlemen of the House to the fact that the value of wheat exported in 1932, including flour, was the lowest of any year since 1905. With reference to raw cotton, with one exception, the year 1931, the value of our cotton exports for 1932 was less than any year, save 1931, since 1903.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I hope that the gentleman will not use too much of my time.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is a fact that there are 12,000,000 acres in cotton in the British Empire. This fact was brought out in the hearings.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not recall the acreage, but a large number of markets have been taken from us.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I decline to yield further.

From 1920 to 1930 we exported seven times as much as we did in the seventies of the last century.

For 50 years during good times and bad times, low tariffs or high tariffs, our imports have been divided 25 percent finished goods, 25 percent partly finished products, and 50 percent of raw products on the free list. The volume and value of our world trade has varied greatly over the years, but the proportions and divisions of commodities have remained practically the same.

The first purpose of this bill is to permit the President to change tariff duties in order to recover the world trade we have lost, but the President will use the utmost care and caution before exercising the great powers granted him under the bill. He has every agency of the Government at his command to advise and inform him. He will be thoroughly prepared to act instantly whenever our national interests require it.

For the 12 years of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930 there were very few changes made in the tariff schedules by Executive orders authorized by those laws.

I have here a report from the United States Tariff Commission. Under section 315 of the act of 1922 there were 32 increases made in the tariffs and 5 decreases, 37 in all. It might interest the farmers to know that the principal increases were made in their interests. Wheat was increased from 30 cents to 42 cents. Flour was increased. Butter was increased. Onions, peanuts, whole eggs and mixed eggs, flaxseed, fresh milk and cream, window glass, and linseed or flaxseed oil were increased. Mill feeds and bran, bobwhite quail, paintbrush handles, cresylic acid, and phenol were decreased. There were 37 changes in all. No changes were made in 4 cases, and no action taken at all on 8 applications.

Under section 336 of the act of 1930 there were 106 investigations; 58 of them were completed. Twenty-five resulted in increased duties, 26 resulted in decreased duties—it was almost a stand-off—and in 56 investigations there were no changes made.

So I do not expect great tariff changes to occur following this legislation. But the fact the President has this authority will be a powerful influence in making trade agreements in our interests. Other nations have granted similar authority to their rulers, and we should put our President on a level with them. We do not want to send a colonel or a brigadier general to represent us. We want to empower our President with the authority of a full general and give him the same authority and power granted to those who represent other nations.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, there is no foundation for the prophecies of disaster that impend if the President is given the powers to act contained in this bill. The Nation wants action, because it has experienced the disasters that resulted from the standpat policy of delay and inaction which has brought us to the condition with which we are now confronted. The Congress should pass this measure promptly and permit the President to go forward in his great work of recovering the markets we have lost and restoring the prosperity that is the rightful heritage of the American people. We must give the President the necessary power and authority to fight to bring it back to us. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I intend to vote for this bill—

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was sure the gentleman would.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. But I want to ask the gentleman one question. Many have been writing me from my own State, and they seem to be afraid the President will not take care of the farmers under this measure. I think the President will, and I want to ask the gentleman if he honestly thinks the President will give the American farming industry a fair and square deal.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I certainly think he will—I know he will—because we judge the action of men in the future by what they have done in the past. The President is a farmer himself. I have just received a little memento sent to me from Dutchess County, N.Y., by a friend of mine in the county where the President's farm is located. I know the President is agriculture-minded. He will fight for us, Mr. JOHNSON, and I am willing to trust him, and I am pleased to know that the gentleman from Minnesota is also going to vote for this legislation.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Can the President do any worse under this authority than President Hoover did during the 4 years he was in power?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I hope he can do much better, and I know he will.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Is it not a fact that the President has already shown, during his administration, his attitude toward labor by reviving and invigorating the Federal land banks in order to help the farmer, and also the intermediate credit banks and all the other agricultural activities that he has favored since March 1933?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and I am pleased that the gentleman has brought that to my attention. We have taken care of the interests of the farmer so far as saving his home, giving him cheap money, and helping him through moratoriums in order to save that which he might have lost without such action, and now we propose to give him what I may say again is the thing which the farmer most needs—a chance to sell his goods in a market that will enable him to pay his debts.

Mr. WEARIN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEARIN. I recognize in the gentleman from Nebraska a great authority upon this subject, and consequently I want to ask this question. I have gathered from the gentleman's remarks this morning that it is true our greatest periods of prosperity have moved along, hand in hand, with times during which we have had the largest volume of foreign trade.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Both foreign and domestic trade—they go up and down together.

Mr. WEARIN. Certainly. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER].

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, it is a rather sorry state of affairs when a man who has the privilege of being affiliated with the Democratic side of the House and who happens to be opposed to the tariff bill under consideration cannot get any time from his own side. It shows the liberal attitude existing with a great many leaders on this side of the House and their spirit of fairness.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The time was equally divided between those opposed and those in favor of the bill, and the gentleman on the other side was given half of the time.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I believe I have the right to be affiliated with this side of the House; and even if I am against the bill, I should receive time from my own side.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That would give the other side more than half of the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I think I am entitled to some time from my own side.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But that would give three fourths of the time, perhaps, to those opposed to the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman from Nebraska, in all fairness—and it should go into the Record—that on the basis of numbers, we have twice as much time as the Members on the other side, and that is the reason I yielded to the gentleman. I realize they are very short of time on the other side, and I may also add that we have refused to yield time to those on this side who are in favor of the bill.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. My time is to be devoted entirely to the relation of the sugar industry to the apparent effects this measure may have on those of us who grow continental cane and beet sugar; and, for one, I can now say to the leadership of this House, that we cannot, with any degree of safety, pass this tariff bill unless you do something definitely to take care of beet- and cane-sugar production in this country.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HOEPEL. Can we not rely upon the judgment of our President to protect those industries?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I can to a certain extent rely on the President of the United States; but when he places the entire thing in the hands of Secretary Wallace, whose policies are dangerous to the beet industry in this country, I, for one, cannot trust him.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman in mind the President's attitude toward the veterans?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. It happens that Secretary Wallace appeared before the public, and I want to quote from an article in the New York Journal of March 5, 1934:

Secretary Wallace's pet abhorrence appeared to be the various factions, including the sugar-beet growers, which he indicated have been twisting and pulling at the Federal Government not only since the present administration took charge but long before, to further their interests.

HITS SUGAR INTERESTS

At one point he directly attacked the western sugar interests, who argued that "they ought to have the right to produce all their own sugar and still get parity prices."

"Now, it happens", he said, "that any expansion above the past history in their production is directly at the expense of the efficient producers of agricultural and industrial products which are sent to Cuba, for instance. I pointed out to the sugar-beet growers—not sugar-beet growers, because they don't usually come to Washington, but to certain representatives there—that the total shipments of goods from this country to Cuba had declined from $200,000,000 to $25,000,000 and that any expansion above past history in the sugar-beet industry would be definitely at the expense of our efficient industries and our efficient agriculture. Less than 1 farmer in 100 is engaged in sugar beets. There are only about 30,000 workers altogether in the refineries of all kinds.

"That industry is a very small industry, and yet—I am describing this to indicate the tensivity of a situation that can arise with a small industry—because of the fact that it has been used in the past to organize itself to strive for higher tariffs, because it has been one of those industries on the firing line, it has developed a type of political pressure that is quite unique. I will say this: That at the present time it is impossible, politically impossible, to retire the sugar-beet industry from its present position. The most you could hope for is to keep it from further expansion.

"I don't think the internationally minded people realize the way in which the inefficient American industries have made themselves solid with Congress. They are specialists in that."

Now, in God's name, what is wrong with the American beet-sugar growers? Who have a better right to produce the sugar required for domestic consumption in this country than the growers of beet sugar? I for one believe that the American market belongs to the American farmer. [Applause.] I am not willing, for one, to put this thing in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I have.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It puts this power in the hands of the President of the United States and not in the hands of any Cabinet officer.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. That means putting it into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, who is willing to trade off the rights of the beet-sugar growers for the welfare of Cuba. He does that in the face of the fact that Professor Tugwell, in a hearing before the House Committee on Agriculture, said that we could produce in this country the entire amount of sugar consumed as cheaply as any foreign country could do it.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Has the gentleman read the statement made by Secretary Wallace before the Ways and Means Committee included in the hearings on this bill?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. No; I have not read the hearings on this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think it would be helpful if the gentleman would read them. That would give him a definite idea of how Secretary Wallace stands. He ought to do that instead of quoting what some newspaper says.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I am taking Secretary of Agriculture Wallace at his own words. He testified before the House Committee on Agriculture. I know what his attitude is as to the domestic production of sugar. He never has been in favor of it; and if he has his way, he will destroy it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The testimony of Secretary Wallace before the Ways and Means Committee is exactly in line with what the gentleman from Nebraska has stated.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I agree with the gentleman.

(The time of Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska having expired, he was given 5 minutes more by Mr. DOUGHTON.)

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. The condition of the sugar-beet industry is very serious. We have been trying to ascertain some definite policy of the administration toward this domestic product, but so far we have been unable to do so.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And there are dozens of other industries in this country in just exactly the same situation as the sugar-beet industry. They are fearful of what is going to happen to them if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. In my district, for example, only the day before yesterday some people hanged Secretary Wallace in effigy. I am not in favor of hanging him in person, but I am in favor of doing something with him. I refuse to follow the leadership of the Secretary of Agriculture, who has, time after time, in public and in private life, stated that the sugar industry in this country is an expensive industry, and ought to be destroyed. I cannot go along with him in the idea that our first duty and obligation is to the welfare of the people of Cuba and the Philippine Islands. I do not care what the moral obligation of our people to those people may be, my first obligation is to the people that I represent, the American farmer, and I for one am not going to yield to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture unless it is enacted into law, so I will know exactly what the Secretary of Agriculture can do, rather than leaving it to his idea of what he should do; and until such time I do not believe this legislation can pass, until you have done something to take care of the sugar producers in this country.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. I am in general agreement with the gentleman's desire to protect the American farmer, so far as the domestic market is concerned, but there is one question that still troubles me and that is whether the quality of the beet sugar produced here compares favorably with the quality of the Cuban cane sugar?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I do not think there is any difference in quality. We think in our country that it is better. Month after month we have been trying to get some sort of a definite idea from this administration on the matter of sugar, but we have been given completely the run-around month after month. It has come to the time now when my beet-sugar farmers have got to know what this administration is going to do for them, and I, for one, am not willing to support this tariff bill until this Democratic administration has passed some legislation that will insure my people fair treatment; and I say to every one of you men who come from beet- and cane-sugar areas that you better not support this tariff legislation until something has been done definitely for your sugar-growing people.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Is the beet-farming business in the gentleman's State conducted by American labor or by imported cheap labor?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. About 85 percent of it is American labor, and probably more than that, because most of Mexican labor has been sent back to Mexico.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Along the line of what the attitude of those in power is toward the beet-sugar industry, I call the attention of the gentleman to a speech made by the Speaker, Mr. RAINEY, when the tariff question was up before. He insulted the beet-sugar industry by referring to it as an industry for which Germany furnished the seed and Mexico the labor.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. If they are going to trade something off in this country, I am willing to have them trade something off that you men have, but they will not trade off the beet-sugar industry that I represent, except over my dead body.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman have also in mind the fact that the Secretary of State is a free-trader?

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I happen to be one of those rare Democrats who believe in a high tariff. I believe this country is going to be self-contained some day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include some tables and telegrams.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SCOTTSLUFF, NEBR., March 22, 1934.

MEMORANDUM A

1. World sugar production and world sugar requirements: The world consumption of sugar is now about 24,000,000 tons a year. World production in recent years is shown in table 1 and table 1a, both issued by the United States Tariff Commission.

2. Break-down of production by countries: See table 1 and table 1a, attached.

3. Normal beet-sugar and cane-sugar production in the United States: See table 1.

4. Normal tonnage of beets and normal tonnage of cane:

	Beets	Cane ¹
	Tons	Tons
1933-34 ²	11,500,000	2,690,000
1932-33.....	9,070,000	2,586,000
1931-32.....	7,908,000	2,310,000
1930-31.....	9,199,000	2,599,000
Average.....	9,418,000	2,621,250

² Estimated.

5. Break-down by States of beet and cane sugar production: Production of beet sugar by States is shown in table 2. Since Louisiana produces virtually all cane grown in the United States, the production for that State (see par. 4) is the dominant factor.

6. The number of acres grown to beets in each of the last 4 crop years follows:

1933-34.....	1,065,000
1932-33.....	764,000
1931-32.....	713,000
1930-31.....	775,000
Average.....	829,250

The Louisiana cane area averages about 150,000 acres.

7. Capital invested in beet-sugar industry and Louisiana cane-sugar industry, exclusive of lands: The investment in the beet-sugar industry is roughly $250,000,000; in the southern cane-sugar industry, $150,000,000.

8. Capital invested in producing lands by respective industries: Since the beet acreage of 1 year produces wheat or corn the next, it is difficult to calculate exactly how large a sum is invested in beet land. Yet if the 1,200,000 acres devoted to beets and Louisiana cane in 1933 were valued at $100 an acre, the total investment would reach $120,000,000.

9. Approximate number of investors and stockholders in each industry: This it is impossible to answer definitely. Some of the larger companies, however, have 8,000 or 10,000 stockholders.

10. Number of beet growers and number employed in beet growing: Latest reports from Dr. John Lee Coulter show slightly more than 72,000 farmers, plus 159,000 farm hands employed in growing the crop.

11. Approximate period of employment: Each acre of beets requires about 5 days of work in thinning, hoeing, and harvesting, which gives a man tending 10 acres about 2 months of work.

12. Employees engaged in refining beet and cane sugar grown in the United States: The beet-sugar industry in 1933 employed about 33,000 at factories, offices, beet dumps, etc. The southern cane-sugar mills employ about 5,000.

13. Approximate term of employment: The processing of beets requires from 100 to 135 days, working 24 hours a day. In the period between manufacturing campaigns the staff of employees, of course, is greatly reduced. In the southern raw-sugar mills the period of employment is about 75 days.

14. Number of beet-sugar plants and cane-sugar plants now installed, and number operating: There are 103 beet-sugar mills, 85 of them operating in 1933. Louisiana has 132 raw-sugar mills, 63 in operation.

15. Collateral break-down of industries identified with sugar industry: The estimated expenditures of beet-sugar manufacturers of the United States during the campaign 1933-34, was as follows:

Total paid farmers for beets.....	$55,000,000
Total paid for fuel.....	2,122,000
Total paid for lime-rock.....	932,000
Total paid for bags.....	3,896,000
Total paid for other supplies.....	4,992,000
Total paid for new installations (material only).....	526,000
Total paid for wages in and about factories.....	11,121,000
Total paid for office help, field and factory superintendence, managers, and officers.....	4,538,000
Total paid for freight in and out on beets, supplies, sugars, molasses, and pulp.....	31,410,000
Total paid for taxes, brokerage, insurance, and all other items.....	7,893,000

Total expenditures..... 122,480,000

The estimated consumption of certain commodities by beet-sugar manufacturers of the United States, 1933-34, follows:

Coal.....	tons.....	1,620,000
Limestone.....	do.....	648,000
Coke.....	do.....	59,400
Cotton cloth for sugar bags.....	square yards.....	54,840,000
Cotton duck for filters.....	do.....	909,000

16. To what extent is child labor used in the beet-sugar industry in this country? Child labor has never been used in the processing of sugar beets, and the supposed prevalence of child labor in the beet fields is always vastly exaggerated. At present plans are being made to abolish entirely the use of children in the field.

17. What is the average annual amount paid to farmers for beets? The yearly payments have been as low as $40,000,000 and as high as $100,000,000, depending on the price of sugar.

18. If beet growing were discontinued, to what other use could lands profitably be put? Under present conditions, it is doubtful if these lands could be put to any profitable use. Planted to cereal crops, the land would serve only to destroy the present system of rotation and add millions of bushels to the oversupply of those crops which we now produce in surplus quantities.

19. Economic importance of the beet-sugar industry to Western States: For farmers in the arid sections of the Mountain States the sugar beet is not only a desirable crop but a necessary one. Its importance is indicated by the fact that three fourths of all American beet sugar is produced on irrigated land west of the Mississippi, and the yields there consistently average 50 percent greater than in dry-farming districts. The adaptability of the beet to western agriculture is exceeded only by its usefulness. The reasons can be summarized briefly:

First, the beet contract assures to the farmer an immediate market and a responsible purchaser at a price which, in ordinary circumstances, is known months in advance. This advantage prevails in few crops anywhere, and in none that can be grown successfully in irrigated districts.

Second, because the income from beets can be so readily calculated, the growing crop has a definite loan value. The beet farmer finds it relatively easy to finance his other operations through local banks.

Third, the stability of market and price give the grower an anchor to windward in planning other crops. He can afford "gambling" crops.

Fourth, the beet is hardy. Better than any other crop, it can withstand the hailstorms to which Western States are subjected.

Fifth, the beet requires an extended growing season. The peak loads of planting, thinning, and harvesting are so distributed that they interfere with no other crop.

Sixth, the beet provides the most hours of productive labor—six times as much, for instance, as corn. In a period of acute unemployment this consideration takes on more than ordinary significance.

To these points must be added the most striking advantage of all—that sugar is a concentrated commodity, its value comparatively high in relation to its bulk. Since farmers far removed from primary markets are always confronted by adverse freight rates, this factor is one of utmost significance.

Distance from the general centers of population imposes still another limitation on these farmers. Their products, to a large extent, must be stable and nonperishable. If wheat and corn cannot be grown profitably the western farmer cannot turn to a truck crop. In this situation, obviously, the importance of the beet is magnified.

World sugar production and world sugar requirements:

The world consumption of sugar is now about 24,000,000 tons a year. World production in recent years is shown in table 1 and table 1a, both issued by the United States Tariff Commission.

Breakdown of production by countries: See table 1 and table 1a attached.

Normal beet-sugar and cane-sugar production in the United States: See table 1.

Normal tonnage of beets and normal tonnage of cane

1930-31	9,190,000	2,593,000

Break-down by States of beet- and cane-sugar production:

Production of beet sugar by States is shown in table II. Since Louisiana produces virtually all cane grown in the United States, the production for that State (see par. 4) is the dominant factor.

The number of acres grown to beets in each of the last 4 crop years follows:

	Tons cane
1933-34	1,065,000
1932-33	764,000
1931-32	713,000
1930-31	775,000
Average	829,250

The Louisiana cane area averages about 150,000 acres.

Capital invested in beet-sugar industry and Louisiana cane-sugar industry, exclusive of lands:

The investment in the beet-sugar industry is roughly $250,000,000, in the southern cane-sugar industry $150,000,000.

Capital invested in producing lands by respective industries:

Since the beet acreage of 1 year produces wheat or corn the next, it is difficult to calculate exactly how large a sum is invested in beet land. Yet if the 1,200,000 acres devoted to beets in Louisiana cane in 1933 were valued at $100 an acre, the total investment would reach $120,000,000.

Approximate number of investors and stockholders in each industry:

This it is impossible to answer definitely. Some of the larger companies, however, have 8,000 or 10,000 stockholders.

Number of beet growers and number employed in beet growing:

Latest reports from Dr. John Lee Coulter show slightly more than 72,000 farmers, plus 159,000 farm hands employed in growing the crop.

Approximate period of employment:

Each acre of beets requires about 5 days of work in thinning, hoeing, and harvesting, which gives a man tending 10 acres about 2 months of work.

Employees engaged in refining beet and cane sugar grown in the United States:

The beet-sugar industry in 1933 employed about 33,000 at factories, offices, beet dumps, etc. The southern cane-sugar mills employ about 5,000.

Approximate term of employment:

The processing of beets requires from 100 to 135 days, working 24 hours a day. In the period between manufacturing campaigns the staff of employees, of course, is greatly reduced. In the southern raw-sugar mills the period of employment is about 75 days.

Number of beet-sugar plants and cane-sugar plants now installed, and number operating:

There are 103 beet-sugar mills, 85 of them operating in 1933. Louisiana has 132 raw-sugar mills, 63 in operation.

Collateral breakdown of industries identified with sugar industry:

Estimated expenditures of beet-sugar manufacturers of the United States during the campaign 1933-34, were as follows:

Total paid farmers for beets	$55,000,000
Total paid for fuel	2,122,000
Total paid for limrock	982,000
Total paid for bags	3,896,000
Total paid for other supplies	4,992,000
Total paid for new installations (material only)	526,000
Total paid for wages in and about factories	11,121,000
Total paid for office help, field and factory superintendence, managers, and officers	4,538,000
Total paid for freight in and out on beets, supplies, sugars, molasses, and pulp	31,410,000
Total paid for taxes, brokerage, insurance, and all other items	7,893,000

Total expenditures 122,480,000

The estimated consumption of certain commodities by beet-sugar manufacturers of the United States, 1933-34, follow:

One million six hundred and twenty thousand tons of coal; 648,000 tons of limestone; 59,400 tons of coke; 54,840,000 square yards of cotton cloth for sugar bags; 909,000 square yards of cotton duck for filters.

To what extent is child labor used in the beet-sugar industry in this country?

Child labor has never been used in the processing of sugar beets, and the supposed prevalence of child labor in the beet fields is always vastly exaggerated. At present plans are being made to abolish entirely the use of children in the field.

What is the average annual amount paid to farmers for beets?

The yearly payments have been as low as $40,000,000 and as high as $100,000,000, depending on the price of sugar.

If beet growing were discontinued, to what other use could lands profitably be put?

Under present conditions it is doubtful if these lands could be put to any profitable use. Planted to cereal crops, the land would serve only to destroy the present system of rotation and add millions of bushels to the oversupply of those crops which we now produce in surplus quantities.

Economic importance of the beet-sugar industry to Western States:

For farmers in the arid sections of the Mountain States the sugar beet is not only a desirable crop but a necessary one. Its importance is indicated by the fact that three fourths of all American beet sugar is produced on irrigated land west of the Mississippi, and the yields there consistently average 50 percent greater than in dry-farming districts. The adaptability of the beet to western agriculture is exceeded only by its usefulness. The reasons can be summarized briefly:

First, the beet contract assures to the farmer an immediate market, and a responsible purchaser at a price which in ordinary circumstances is known months in advance. This advantage prevails in few crops anywhere, and in none that can be grown successfully in irrigated districts.

Second, because the income from beets can be so readily calculated the growing crop has a definite loan value. The beet farmer finds it relatively easy to finance his other operations through local banks.

Third, the stability of market and price give the grower an anchor to windward in planning other crops. He can afford "gambling" crops.

Fourth, the beet is hardy. Better than any other crop it can withstand the hailstorms to which Western States are subjected.

Fifth, the beet requires an extended growing season. The peak loads of planting, thinning, and harvesting are so distributed that they interfere with no other crop.

Sixth, the beet provides the most hours of productive labor—six times as much, for instance, as corn. In a period of acute unemployment this consideration takes on more than ordinary significance.

To these points must be added the most striking advantage of all—that sugar is a concentrated commodity, its value comparatively high in relation to its bulk. Since farmers far removed from primary markets are always confronted by adverse freight rates, this factor is one of utmost significance.

Distance from the general centers of population imposes still another limitation on these farmers. Their products, to a large extent, must be stable and nonperishable. If wheat and corn cannot be grown profitably, the western farmer cannot turn to a truck crop. In this situation, obviously, the importance of the beet is magnified.

Table 1 above referred to is a summary of world sugar production, crops years from 1906-7 to 1932-33, inclusive, including estimates revised to July 1933, covering cane-sugar production in continental United States, United States insular areas, Cuba, Java, British India, and all other countries; and beet-sugar production in the United States, Canada, and Europe.

Table 1A represents detailed statistics by countries of the sugar crops of the world revised to July 1933.

Table 2, sugar beets and beet sugar, total United States production, 1901 to 1932, and production by States, 1928 to 1932.

(These tables are submitted for the printed record.)

If the United States is under obligation to assist Cuba in its time of distress, it is a national obligation to be borne equally by all of the people of the United States and not by one particular area or one special group.

Continental and insular sugar growers are not responsible for disorder in Cuba, for its financial difficulties, or for the reckless expenditure of American millions in the overproduction of sugar. While American citizens are undoubtedly sympathetic with the difficulties now confronting Cuba, we respectfully submit that if their responsibility is a United States responsibility it does not belong exclusively to the sugar-producing areas of the United States, much less especially to the United States sugar-beet farmers. Cuba is a foreign nation, with its own flag and its own government. The limitation on American relationship is the Platt amendment, which was enacted more for the benefit of Cuba than for the advantage of the United States. With this exception, America has no more responsibility to Cuba than to any other foreign nation.

At this point in my statement I desire to insert the following table:

NOTE.—Basic data from Willett and Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to express to my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee my profound appreciation of the unselfish attitude displayed by each member of that hard-working body during the long and tiring hearings held on the various measures which have been committed to that committee for consideration. To me it has been an inspiring as well as instructive experience that I shall ever cherish. Our distinguished chairman, Mr. DOUGHTON, has displayed a wonderful spirit of fairness throughout, and I am sure that my colleagues join with me in the wish that he may long continue a Member of this great legislative body.

There is no economic subject upon which there exists greater differences in opinion than on the tariff. Indeed, it is the main line of cleavage between the two major political parties, so it was inevitable that the majority and minority reports submitted with the measure now under consideration should reflect the attitudes of the two groups. We deny that our tariff rates are excessive. In fact, our rates are next to England—67 percent is on the free list and 33 percent protected.

Mr. Chairman, I fail to see any merit in the proposed legislation, which would give to the President power to negotiate trade agreements and reciprocal trade treaties without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] let me say that the American tariff law is one of the lowest in the world. It is down near the level of that of England. Also let me remind you gentlemen that 67 percent of all the articles listed in the present tariff law are on the free list, and only 33 percent on the dutiable list; and then we come in here and urge a further lowering of the bars. It may well be asked if we have lost our sanity.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. If I may finish my statement, then I shall be glad to yield.

I should like to make a consecutive statement, if I may. This legislation would vest in the President powers which now rest with Congress under the Federal Constitution. My position must not be construed as one of distrust of any individual, but rather one that would prefer to follow constitutional lines. I do not believe we should become hysterical in the face of the present emergency, neither do I believe that we should surrender any of our liberties, which have cost so much in blood, suffering, and treasure to obtain. All about us we see government of, by, and for the people being swept aside, and one-man rule being substituted.

I well recall my first experience in this body. It was in the extra session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, April 1917, which had been called for the specific purpose of declaring war against the Central Powers, notwithstanding that the people but a few months previously had decided by a national referendum at the polls that they wished to remain neutral. Previous to coming to Washington, indeed, during the campaign in the fall of 1916 I had repeatedly stated that I was opposed to our entrance into the war and would so vote if elected. Hardly had I arrived in the city when a deluge of telegrams and letters began swamping my office and nearly all of them carried this motto, "Stand by the President." It was the hysterical cry of a group whose power of reasoning had been temporarily dethroned as a result of a skillful campaign of falsehood and misrepresentation, carefully played up by the great metropolitan press of the country. The people did not want war, but their leaders did. Now we know that the people were right and their leaders wrong. Had we remained out of that war we would not today be obliged to spend billions for relief work, not to mention the enormous debt with which we are now saddled. Had we remained out of the war we would not now have a bankrupt agriculture that is threatening to engulf the country, neither would we have many of the other ills that afflict us.

It has been said that there is nothing new under the sun, but there is, and I refer to the new philosophy on economics for which the proponents of this bill stand. In recent statements to the press and in addresses delivered in various parts of the country they announce without reservations that the first requisite for recovery in this country is to build up the foreign purchasing power through a lowering of our tariff rates, which, of course, can only mean an increase in imports from other countries.

To that plea my answer is, let us build up American purchasing power first. That is most urgent, and it is our duty to do so. Why should we lower our tariff at the present time when there is so much unemployment, suffering, and want at home, and when we are already importing too many agricultural and industrial commodities in large volume, such as cheese, rye, barley, flax, sugar, vegetable oils, carpets, footwear, glass and earthen ware, textiles, matches, pulp and print paper, and many other products, and while prices at home, by reason of these imports, are at their lowest levels in history and unemployment the greatest.

Let us take the case of sugar. Under wise Republican protective policies the domestic beet- and cane-sugar industry has grown steadily and healthfully, so that we now produce one third of all the sugar consumed in the United States. Last year more than a million acres—1,065,000—were grown to beets, and these acres yielded 1,756,000 short tons of sugar—300,000 tons more than the President suggested as the limit for domestic production in his message to Congress.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I should like to have the gentleman inform the House what the President wishes to do with that 300,000 tons of sugar production that he proposes to take away from the sugar producers of this country? I mean by that, the beet-raising farmers of this country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why, Mr. Chairman, the President proposes to take this great privilege away from the American farmer and transfer it to the people of a foreign country—the farmers of Cuba. He closes his eyes to the fact that we raise surpluses of many of our agricultural commodities, and that the growing of sugar beets contributes to the substantial relief of this situation. He should ask Congress to do the thing which would permit an increase in the growing of sugar beets, instead of seeking to reduce that activity as he is now doing. He could by doing this bring real relief to our much-distressed farmers.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further to anyone.

Since we produce at home only one third of the sugar we consume, it is obvious that beets compete with no other farm crop. On the contrary, the potential market for this commodity is greater than for any other major crop grown in the United States, and each additional acre of beets means a like reduction in the lands now growing surplus crops, so it would seem the part of wisdom to encourage the beet-sugar industry in every legitimate manner.

If this administration follows out its proposal to seriously reduce the acreage of beets, there can only be one consequence: The farmers now raising beets must turn to some other crop. In Minnesota, for instance, they would probably undertake dairying, or the raising of potatoes, and since beet lands are always the most fertile and productive we might expect a greatly increased competition in milk products and potatoes, of which we already have large surpluses. In the irrigated sections of the West the change would be even more striking, for there the lands taken from beets might easily produce 600 bushels of potatoes, or 40 bushels of wheat to the acre.

Surely no one will contend that this would make for a better balanced agriculture, nor provide a solution for our surplus problem. We have not forgotten how the holders of Cuban sugar ran the price of sugar to the consumer up to 32 cents per pound back in 1920, when they had us within their power because the supply of domestic sugar was exhausted, and if we would avert a similar experience in the future we should encourage and stimulate the growing of sugar beets in this country so as to make us independent of grasping outsiders.

In Minnesota our annual sugar requirement is about 250,000,000 pounds, yet we produced only about 94,500,000 pounds at Chaska and East Grand Forks in 1933. To provide for our own needs in that State would require 4 new factories and an additional 70,000 acres, most of which are now devoted to potatoes, corn, and wheat, of which we have substantial surpluses. Why not a better balanced agriculture, rather than a reduction in production? That would mean more money for our farmers with no drain on the Federal Treasury. At this point I desire to read a letter that I received on the subject a day or two ago:

AUTOMOBILE CLUB OF CHASKA,
Chaska, Minn., March 20, 1934.

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KNUTSON: Current press notices indicating the attitude of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace toward the domestic beet-sugar industry are very discouraging to the farmers of this section.

Contrary to the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture that the beet-sugar industry is inefficient, we submit that if labor in Cuba and the Philippines were paid on the same basis as labor in this country, the domestic industry would be found to be the more efficient. Beet labor in this section receives 35 to 50 cents per hour, and fully 85 percent employed are local people. Over a half million dollars was paid in this State to beet workers during the past year.

In this section farmers generally are signing up for the corn-hog and wheat reduction campaign on the theory that there is a surplus of these export crops. They cannot see the logic that would require that they reduce their acreage of a crop, only 25 percent of which is produced in this country and which has given them their only cash return during the past 2 years.

The members of this civic organization respectfully request that you use your influence to protect the beet-sugar industry for the farmers and labor of Minnesota.

HOWARD HABEGGER,
President Chaska Automobile Club.
FRED U. SPLETTSTOEISSER,
Secretary Chaska Automobile Club.

Surely all must be aware of the fact that we cannot restore prosperity in this country by producing less at home and buying more abroad. The less we produce in this country the fewer will be employed and the more money will be sent out of the country, and that would be burning the candle at both ends.

Surely the proponents of this measure will not contend that we should produce less butter, cheese, and animal fats and increase our imports of these products.

Surely no one seriously thinks that it would promote the prosperity of the American people to decrease the production of beet sugar and flax in this country by restricting the acreage and permitting Cuban sugar and Argentinian flax to fill the vacuums created by such reductions.

Surely no one believes that it would benefit the American dairyman if we further increased our butter and cheese imports from Canada, Italy, Argentina, and New Zealand and decreased our own production correspondingly.

Surely no one would have us believe that it would help the American stock, sheep, and swine raiser if we were to lower the tariff bars and permit increased imports of livestock, sheep, wool, and swine from other lands at a time when we are having difficulty in marketing our own livestock.

Take the case of rye. Last fall there appeared in my home paper a letter from one of our leading dairymen, which I desire to read to you at this point:

OCTOBER 30, 1933.

EDITOR TIMES-JOURNAL,
St. Cloud, Minn.:

About a week ago I noticed in the market reports that there had recently been imported into this country 3,000,000 bushels of rye from Europe and, as a result of the importations, the rye prices dropped 20 cents per bushel, to be followed a few days later by another drop of 5 cents when 300,000 bushels of additional rye came in from Canada. Unfortunately, all other grains took a tumble along with rye, so it is fair to say that the whole thing cost the American farmer at least $20,000,000. In looking into the matter I find that we are importing large quantities of butter, grain, and milk from Canada and butter from Holland, Denmark, and New Zealand, dried eggs from China, dried fish from Japan, potatoes from Canada, and canned and chilled beef from Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil.

In view of these importations of agricultural products, which are sold below domestic production costs, we need not wonder that old cows do not bring enough to pay for trucking and commission; that butter fat is 10 cents below what it should be; eggs likewise.

We read in the press that 10,000,000 Americans are out of work largely because of importations of industrial products, so our home market also suffers from lack of consumption. The solution lies in increasing all tariff rates—agricultural and industrial—to a point where the American producer can hold his own market.

Government reports show that we import sufficient quantities of agricultural and industrial products, which we can produce at home, to give work to 3½ million Americans. In normal times we consume 93 percent of our total production. If we would confine our consumption to home products, which would give us the home market, there would be no surplus and little unemployment.

Free the Philippines immediately to help the American dairyman.

President Roosevelt is doing his level best to help us and so is Congressman HAROLD KNUTSON, who has consistently fought and worked for a tariff law that would give us our own market. They are working together for the best interests of our country, but we should do our part in buying American goods. If we will do that, it would go far toward solving the agricultural problem as well as unemployment.

Yours for the American producer.

Yours very truly,

ISADORE A. SCHWINGHAMER,
Albany, Minn.

Evidently the situation with reference to rye has not improved any since because on yesterday I received a letter from my boyhood home which indicates that the situation has not materially changed. The letter follows:

Clear Lake Elevator Co., Clear Lake, Minn., March 19, 1934—

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does the gentleman agree with the statements in the letter he just read?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Then I take it that the gentleman's objection to this legislation is the fear that it will not raise tariff duties?

Mr. KNUTSON. My good friend from Washington has not any idea that it is the purpose of the President or whoever he delegates the power to, to raise tariff rates. I am quoting the Secretary of Agriculture who says it is necessary to reduce our tariff rates in order to raise foreign buying power.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I asked the gentleman that question preliminary to another, for which I hope he will yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman give me a little time?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I think the gentleman speaks a little better if he has a few questions asked.

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman from Minnesota stated in the early part of his remarks that he had constitutional objections to this bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. I said I did not have. I am not so concerned about the constitutional aspects of it as I am the economic aspects of it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I was just about to call the gentleman's attention to some questions he asked of the witness Dickinson, from the Department of Commerce, when the matter was being heard before the committee, in which the gentleman said he was not so concerned about the constitutional aspects of the question, but said:

Frankly I know the purpose of this legislation is to lower rates. If I thought for a minute that it was proposed to raise rates to meet present conditions, I would vote for this legislation and be glad of the opportunity to do so.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is the gentleman quoting me now?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes. That is the gentleman's statement in the hearings.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman read that again, please?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL (reading):

Frankly I know the purpose of this legislation is to lower rates. If I thought for a minute that it was proposed to raise rates to meet present conditions, I would vote for this legislation and be glad of the opportunity to do so.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am very glad the gentleman has introduced that into my remarks, because that is something I overlooked.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I just wanted to get the attitude of the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. My attitude has not changed. If the gentleman can give us assurance that rates will be raised in the event this bill becomes law, I will vote for it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I simply wanted to bring out this point, that the gentleman from Minnesota is not objecting to this legislation on constitutional grounds.

Mr. KNUTSON. Not at all. Not at all, although I do like to go along constitutional lines if it is possible to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman also, as I understand, voted for the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930, which contained the flexible provisions?

Mr. KNUTSON. Absolutely, because I knew that the purpose of the flexible provision was to raise rates; never to lower them.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. So the gentleman is not making any constitutional objection to this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. No, no. We do not expect the Constitution to be very sacred when the Democrats are in power. It was not during the war and it is not now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Then so far as the Constitution is concerned, you feel it is all right to give the President power to increase rates, but if power is given to decrease them, then the question of constitutionality is involved?

Mr. KNUTSON. Then it is all wrong if you give him power to lower rates.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. One other question. The letter which the gentleman referred to, as I heard it read, suggested that every tariff rate on agricultural commodities, and industrial products as well, should be increased?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Now, if the gentleman is so strong for that, why did he turn to the House and say when he read that language, "These are his words and not mine"?

Mr. KNUTSON. Because I wanted the House to know that there are others who feel the same way as I do.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It seems to me it would indicate that the gentleman wanted to emphasize that those were the thoughts of the writer and not the gentleman's own thoughts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me say that there had been a break while the Presiding Officer was calling the House to order, and I did not want the House to forget that I was yet reading the letter.

Evidently the situation with reference to rye has not improved any since, because on yesterday I received a letter from my boyhood home, Clear Lake, Minn., which indicates that the price of rye is practically what it was a year ago. This letter comes from an elevator man. It reads as follows:

CLEAR LAKE ELEVATOR CO.,
Clear Lake, Minn., March 20, 1934.

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KNUTSON: As you perhaps already know, the chief cash crop of the farmers of this community is rye, and in my line of business I naturally take quite an interest in the crops which are raised and sold here. I have been watching the papers quite closely and I notice that Europe has shipped in here from eight to ten million bushels of rye already, and I am enclosing herewith a clipping from a Minneapolis paper of yesterday to show you that the administration is in favor of letting this rye come in in exchange for some other products. Of course, I do not know what they are trading to these Europeans, but the chances are that it is nothing that benefits the farmers in this community where they make their living by raising rye.

Please look into this matter, and, if you possibly can do so, try and keep out these importations of rye so that our farmers may get a few pennies for their labors here.

I thank you for any favors you may be able to show for your home supporters here, and I hope you will keep me advised of what is being done in this matter at Washington. I am,

Yours very truly,

J. H. ARNOLD, Manager.

In this same connection I read a short excerpt from a Minneapolis paper dated March 18, 1934:

[Reprint from Minneapolis paper of Mar. 18, 1934]

Rye holders liquidated as freely as they could because of the official attitude toward the proposed increase of import duties on European offerings. Latest reports from Washington indicate that the administration regards the matter of trade more important than the matter of advancing the price of rye.

Rye is one of the most important crops in many parts of this country. With the repeal of prohibition and the greatly increased demand for rye, the price should be well toward a dollar, but instead is bringing only 50-odd cents per bushel on the local markets back home because of rye importations from Europe and Canada, which constantly lower the price.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman inform us what the import duty on rye is?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is 15 cents a bushel.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. How much rye was imported?

Mr. KNUTSON. Between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000 bushels in 1933.

Mr. WILLFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLFORD. How do those farmers market their rye, in dry or in liquid form?

Mr. KNUTSON. Since the repeal of the prohibition amendment they sell it in dry form.

In Minnesota and in other States manganese mines are closed down. Does anyone seriously contend that it would materially promote prosperity in this country if we were to buy yet more manganese ores from Russia, Brazil, and India, when thousands of idle manganese miners are walking the streets in this country looking for work?

Does anyone really believe that we should increase our imports of shoes, glassware, earthenware, toys, and so forth, from Czechoslovakia and Japan and reduce the output of the American factories engaged in the production of these commodities?

Does anyone honestly believe that we should produce less American textiles and worsted goods and buy more from Europe and Japan?

Under the philosophy advanced in behalf of this legislation we would build up the foreigner's buying power by giving him the American market, which is about all that we have left as a result of our ill-fated venture into international politics back in 1917-18; but let us make no more mistakes. To do so would be at the expense of the American farmer, workingman, and manufacturer.

On all sides we find foreign goods and products on sale. Go into any market place, and one will find that all canned beef on the shelves comes from South America, the matches from Japan and Russia, the crockery and earthenware from Czechoslovakia, as does a very considerable part of the footwear offered for sale. It is almost impossible to buy clothing made from American fabrics, and the oleomargarine and soaps that we use are largely made from vegetable oils that come from the Orient. Dried and powdered eggs in large quantities come from China, and most of our print paper and pulp comes from Canada and Europe. We should not lose sight of the very important fact that when the President reduced the gold content of the dollar he at the same time reduced all specific tariff rates by 40 percent, and as a result we are today on the lowest tariff plane of any country that I know of, and here it is frankly proposed to lower the bars yet more. Have we lost our senses? It would seem so.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Is the gentleman from Minnesota satisfied with the present tariff act?

Mr. KNUTSON. No.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is a Republican tariff act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I know it is a Republican tariff act; but we were too cowardly to put a duty on print paper and wood pulp, as we should have done; and this observation applies to both sides of the aisle.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I take it the gentleman is more nearly satisfied with the tariff act as it now exists than he would be if some of these rates were lowered.

Just what would the gentleman himself do to improve the economic situation through tariff rates?

Mr. KNUTSON. He would raise the rates on the things that are being imported into this country which we can produce at home.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Would the gentleman raise the rates to the point of prohibiting imports?

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman would raise the rates to the point where the American producer would have an equal chance with his foreign competitor. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Then the gentleman's attitude is that of an isolationist so far as America is concerned in an economic sense.

Mr. KNUTSON. No; the gentleman is not an isolationist; the gentleman is a nationalist.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does the gentleman believe in the expansion of our foreign trade?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I believe in the expansion of our foreign trade if this expansion is not accomplished at the expense of the American farmer or the American laboring man.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. How does the gentleman hope to expand our foreign trade if he does not permit some imports to enter the country?

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Washington closes his eyes to the important fact that already 67 percent of all our imports are on the free list and are imported without any restriction whatever.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. If the gentleman would permit this observation: Inasmuch as 67 percent of the imports that come into the United States enter free of duty we are already permitting sizable imports.

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does not the gentleman believe there is some opportunity there for trade agreements that might be of advantage to the United States?

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, yes; if we want to ship goods abroad and bring in champagne and liquor, I think we can do some commerce, but the gentleman ought not to forget that liquors and wines are manufactured from the products of the farm, and that whenever imports of this character are brought into this country such importations take from the American farmer the opportunity to further increase the income from his farm.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one short question?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota know whether or not the gentleman from Washington would like to promote our foreign trade by permitting more foreign lumber to enter the country?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not think he would.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I should like to say to the gentleman from Kansas that we have not yet been very successful in getting much protection for the lumber and timber products of the Northwest.

Mr. KNUTSON. The lumber people are getting protection to the extent of $4 a thousand, which is four times as much as any Republican tariff ever carried.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Minnesota 10 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. We are now buying altogether too much from other lands, and much of our unemployment is the direct result of these large foreign purchases. Is it not high time that we give some heed to the welfare of our own people? If we would restore the farmers' and laborers' purchasing power by giving them the home market, we will be able to take care of the surpluses in all American industries.

At this juncture I would remind you of what Timothy said. It is found in I Timothy 5:8, and reads as follows:

But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

Now, understand, I am not trying to intimate that anyone is an infidel. I am merely quoting Timothy, who was a wise old man. I have a very high regard for those advocating this legislation. They are honestly trying to do a big and hard job to the best of their ability, and they need and deserve our cooperation; but I cannot go along with them in their program to lower the tariff and further open the flood-gates of Europe and the Orient to the American market, which we so sorely need for ourselves at this time.

I can best present what I mean by an illustration: Two pastures lie side by side with but a line fence between. One pasture, which is the foreign market, has been cropped to the grass roots, and the herd is starving; the other pasture, which is the American market, contains barely enough grass to keep the herd in fair shape. The owner of the first pasture proposes that the line fence be removed on the theory that it will increase the range and make for a greater milk yield when, as a matter of fact, to remove the fence would merely result in the starvation of both herds and, in a nutshell, that is just what is here proposed; and if this legislation is enacted, it will be the American producer who will suffer.

I am not so much concerned with the constitutional aspects of this question as I am with its economic angles. The measure before us is predicated upon the theory that our foreign commerce can be greatly increased. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it. In order to restore our lost commerce with other lands, it would be necessary for us to go out into the open world market and compete with the underpaid labor of other countries. This we cannot do, unless we are willing to bring our living standards down to the levels of those with whom we come into competition, because selling costs are always based upon production costs, and those who can live and produce the cheapest will get the business. Rather, I say, let us concentrate our efforts on the home market, which consumes 93 percent of all that we produce and buys for cash at living prices.

Many of you remember when we were the biggest exporter of wheat in the world; but as the wheat fields of Canada, Argentina, and other newer fields became developed, our wheat exports shrank in proportion to their increases in production, because they could produce more cheaply than we could, and the world will buy in that market where it can buy the cheapest and get the most for its money. That is only natural; but, unfortunately for us, we cannot sell in volume under such conditions, and what we do sell will have to be on a world-price market basis. In other words, the world price will be the dominating factor in the domestic market of those commodities of which we have an exportable surplus, because we then lose control of the situation.

Let me illustrate what I mean: We have an exportable surplus in wheat, on which there is a protective tariff of 42 cents per bushel. There have been times when the price of wheat has been but little above the tariff rate, because the world price governed. France is an importer of wheat, and has a protective rate of 88 cents per bushel. By a nicely balanced limitation on imports, to merely fill domestic needs, France has been able to maintain the price of wheat to the French wheatgrower at about $1.50 per bushel by giving him the benefit of the tariff. Now, I ask you, which is preferable?

The proponents of this measure evidently fail to take into consideration two very important factors which makes the proposed plan visionary, impractical, and undesirable: First, the home market consumes over 90 percent of our total production in normal times, hence we should primarily concern ourselves with retaining that market. Second, in order to increase our foreign commerce we will have to extend the credit necessary to permit them to buy from us, and already they owe us billions of dollars for goods bought, which we will never get, or we will have to buy from them commodities to cover such transactions. Save in the case of tropical fruits, tea, coffee, rubber, silk, and a very few more commodities, everything that will be sold to us we already produce at home, and to buy such items abroad can but further restrict production at home, with its resultant curtailment in labor. I ask you, Is it good business for us to go into such a deal?

As I see it the whole proposition is premised on unsound ground. Surely, we will not be able to help our unemployment situation in this country by buying abroad more of the things we can and should produce at home. The testimony had before the committee clearly shows the real purpose of this program, which is to lower the tariff and make it easier for the foreigner to sell to us. At this point I desire to direct your attention to the testimony of Samuel Crowther, which is found in part 6 of the hearings. I consider Mr. Crowther one of our outstanding economists. All of you read his articles in the leading American magazines. Mr. Crowther is an American first, last, and all the time, and he is free from that taint of internationalism which seems to be so popular these days. At this point I will read you several very interesting and illuminating paragraphs from Mr. Crowther's statement to the Committee on Ways and Means in opposition to this bill, which are found in part 6 of the hearings:

Let us consider what, if any, relation exports have to our prosperity. Secretary Hull has given to you the excellent Adam Smith doctrine that nations prosper by the exchange of wealth. That is true to a degree. It was once thought by all the classical economists—and the position is still held by many who have not followed the times—that the nations of the earth were divided into manufacturing nations and raw-material nations—that one half of the world should make and the other half grow. That division no longer holds.

It has been discovered that manufacturing is not a secret but that machinery may be bought and a factory be set up almost anywhere. For instance, American shoe machinery is all over the earth, and it is only a matter of weeks before the latest American style is being made in Mexico or Czechoslovakia. While the raw-material nations of the world have been going into manufacturing, the manufacturing nations have been going into the raising of their own foods, so by a very natural process of evolution—exactly the evolution which brought the country from a raw-material nation to a manufacturing one—the reason for the old international trade has largely vanished.

The change is permanent. The export trade of the world is going the way of the whaling trade, and there is just as much chance of restoring it as there is of restoring the whaling trade by cutting out electricity and decreeing the world-wide use of sperm oil. The British coal trade with Italy can be reestablished only by destroying Mussolini's new water-power stations. The British cotton trade with India can be brought back only by destroying the Indian cotton fields and mills, which is as reasonable as attempting to close our own southern cotton mills in order to revive the cotton trade of New England. Chile can regain the trade in nitrates only if artificial fixation of nitrogen be prohibited. Germany can regain its chemical trade only if the trade in England, the United States, and Japan are shut down, etc.

This change is hitting the nations which have depended upon exports, for they have not adjusted their economies to developing their home markets. The dependence of these nations upon foreign trade during the period 1927-29 is truly extraordinary. We find that during this period the average annual exports of Great Britain, Germany, and Japan amounted to 20 percent of their estimated national income. The percentage for France is 22; for Belgium, 55; for Italy, 15; and for Czechoslovakia, 33. For the Latin American countries, which mostly export raw materials, the percentages are: Argentina, 34; Brazil, 25; Chile, 35; Cuba, 65; and Mexico, 35. In vivid contrast to these percentages is the United States, in which our very large exports during the same period amounted to only 6 percent of our national income, and if intercompany relationships were eliminated the figure would probably not amount to much more than 3 percent.

We import special tobaccos, although we are the largest exporters of tobacco. We import paper and newsprint and paper stocks largely from the forests of Canada. We could, if it were necessary, supply all our paper requirements and likewise all the wool, hides, and skins we import. We have been importing large quantities of nitrates from Chile and potash from Europe, but so rapid has been the progress in the fixation of nitrogen and the development of ammonium sulphate as a byproduct of steel manufacturing that no longer are we in the least dependent on any outside source for our nitrates, either for fertilizer or for explosives. Our potash development has been equally rapid.

We are as independent in dyestuffs as we care to be. It can be stated generally that through the whole chemical field today we are as independent as circumstances warrant, and that the American chemist will produce anything that he is ordered to produce.

There is a group of metals of which we import only a little, but that little is very important. These are antimony, chromium, manganese, platinum, quicksilver, nickel, cobalt, vanadium, and tungsten. In some of these we have a slight production, as in manganese, tungsten, and quicksilver, but in none is it now possible to meet our normal domestic consumption. But metallurgists say that for any of these metals they can find satisfactory substitutes.

The export trade, which we have built up with a good deal of hurrah and flag waving, does not depend on any one article or group of articles. For the period 1926-30 crude materials made up 24.4 percent; crude foodstuffs, 6.4 percent; manufactured foodstuffs, 9.7 percent; semimanufactures, such as copper, lumber, and petroleum, made up 14.1 percent; and finished manufactures made up 45.3 percent. The big export items, taking the 1930 totals, were: Machinery, 13.8 percent; raw cotton, 13.1 percent; petroleum, 13.1 percent; refined oils, 11.6 percent; and automobiles, parts, and trucks, 11.6 percent. It is interesting to note that wheat and packing-house products were each only 4-percent items and did not greatly lead raw tobacco.

These exports, it is said, are of primary importance to us. They have not in recent years amounted to more than 5 or 6 percent of the total production of the United States if we include in the total such highly important but nonexportable items as distribution, transportation, and construction.

We have never squarely faced the fact that, if we sell abroad more than we buy, we must finance the sales through loans. And also we have never faced the fact—and neither has any other nation—that, if the loans made abroad are used for productive-capital purposes, they will result in building up industries abroad which will make the very articles the country has been importing. If the loans are used for unproductive purposes, they will never be repaid. If we take large imports of manufactured goods in return for large exports, we shall have to decide what part of our people will give up their jobs and what part can be shifted to the making of articles for the export trade. That would seem to be a momentous decision. It would be if it had to be made. But the very rapid changes which have been taking place in the world have made the decision for us. We are not going to have a large export trade. The reasons for this have already been set out. Our only concern is with the size of the import trade which we will permit; that is, how much of our home market we will choose to turn over to foreign workmen. The question gets down to exactly that.

We might leave the answering of that question to nature, if finding the right answer would settle anything. But a far greater question is involved. We have within our borders the wealthiest and most complete economic machine the world has ever seen. To the extent that we import and export, we expose that machine to outside control; a war in which we have no concern may throw millions of our people out of work, if their jobs depend either on foreign demand or supply. Instead of a war with arms, we may run into an economic war, waged with cartels and prices that will equally damage our progress. For a while we imagined that foreign commerce was always sweet. Now we know it can be very bitter. We cannot take the sweet without the bitter. But we can choose to have little or nothing of either.

The great majority of the industrialists of the country are already agreed that their possible foreign business is of slight consequence as compared with the future of the home market. They, keeping abreast of science, are realists, and so, reluctantly but positively, they have come to realize that many of the changes which have come about in the world's commerce are basic and that yesterday has gone forever. Even many of the concerns that have a third of a half of the capital abroad and have considered their affairs as international are at the point where they are willing to scrap their foreign investments if they can save their home markets. The really important farm interests, such as the dairy, the cattle, the egg, the fruit, and the vegetable people, depend entirely upon the home market. The wheat farmers and the cotton planters who have now become of less importance in the national picture, would like a large export trade as well as a large domestic trade. That, however, is not in nature.

If, at the height of our exporting when we were giving our goods away to foreigners, the amount that we exported made only a trivial proportion of our trade, how can it be that suddenly the foreign trade has taken an all-important position in our economy? And since, in the United States, we do about one half the business of the whole world, would it not be more to the point to concentrate on the home market?

As I view this whole thing it is a contest between Americanism and internationalism. As for me I will take my place on the side of Americanism. I am more concerned with the welfare of 10,000,000 idle in this country, who would work if they had a chance, than I am with the idle of other countries. [Applause.] Charity begins at home and our duty is to provide for our own people first.

It is high time that we stop playing the role of Santa Claus to other countries, and fulfill our plain duty to our own people. By every rule of the game they should come first, and, if we fail them, we deserve to be driven from power, as we surely will be.

Our paramount duty is to regain the American market for the American producer so that our idle may be put back to work at wages that will enable them to enjoy American standards of living. [Applause.]

My friends, let us return to that rugged spirit of Americanism which made this country great and prosperous. So long as our industries, agricultural and industrial, enjoyed full protection against the competition of pauper labor in other lands we were a happy and prosperous people, but with the fall of foreign currency values in the markets of the world we were forced onto a low-tariff basis which resulted in many factories shutting down and throwing hundreds of thousands out of work because they could not compete with the much cheaper labor of other lands that toiled longer hours per day. This unfortunate situation also had a very depressing effect on agriculture because of the impairment of the buying power of the American people.

How much longer will we shut our eyes to the true state of affairs? The future of our country rests in our own hands, and if we do not apply the necessary remedy, which is an adequate protective tariff, our beloved country and our firesides will be bankrupt as sure as the rising of tomorrow's sun. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McClintic].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for extending to me the courtesy which makes it possible to give my views concerning the pending legislation. This bill, briefly stated, is a measure to enable the President of the United States to deal quickly with other nations of the world in commerce. In other words, it provides the kind of machinery that will make it possible to cut red tape, hue straight to the line, and complete a transaction without the usual delay that is now brought about by the old cumbersome method in effect.

The subject of tariff is a misnomer to most of our people. It is the one subject that usually enters into every campaign. The Republicans for many years have always sponsored a high protective tariff, and the Democrats on the other hand have issued their declaration in favor of a tariff for revenue only. Then there is a middle class who believe in free trade, which means that every article of commerce should be allowed to flow back and forth from one country to the other without any kind of restrictions. There are so many phases that enter into a tariff discussion that it is practically impossible for anyone to have a correct viewpoint on the subject. Corresponding conditions, coupled with supply and demand, are some of the phases that have a bearing on this subject; and when the whole question is summed up, I am inclined to believe that no one can write a formula that will correctly solve this problem. This being true, the term "expediency" can be used in connection with the necessity for this kind of law.

In the days gone by, the Nation has always been confronted with a struggle between two classes—the manufacturer on one side, trying to obtain as high a rate as possible on manufactured articles, and the consumer on the other opposing any kind of legislation which would bring about a monopoly. This being true, one can realize the reason for a difference of opinion concerning this legislation and its effect upon world commerce.

Hearings were held on this bill for about 1 week, and some of the Nation's best-posted men on this subject testified both for and against the legislation. As I view it, those who were interested in the continuation of favorable rates to existing manufacturing concerns opposed the legislation, and on the other hand those who are interested in protecting the markets of the United States abroad favored the legislation.

The Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, a former member of the Ways and Means Committee, who served in Congress for many years with distinction, came before the committee and told us that unless something was done, the policy now in effect on the part of a number of the nations would gradually strangle or destroy our export business, and to cope with this situation it was necessary that the President of the United States be clothed with sufficient power to trade or bargain in such a way as to keep the channels of commerce open so that surplus products could flow freely to the various people of different nations.

It will be interesting to note that on March 16 there was published in a Washington paper a startling statement relative to this subject, and in my time I want the Clerk to read the same to the House, as it portrays in language so clear the actual conditions that we are confronted with that no one, unless he be unduly biased, can object to the passage of some kind of bill that will enable the President to cope with the existing situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

FRENCH DOUBLE TARIFF LEVIES ON UNITED STATES GOODS

PARIS, March 16.—A new blow was struck against American products today when the French Government, acting without Parliament, doubled the duty on machine tools and raised the duties on other products which the United States has heretofore furnished France.

The Government acted under recently granted powers to deal with tariffs. The move was regarded as strategy through which France hopes to arm herself with a trump card for future trade deals with the United States.

The list on which duties were increased includes certain chemicals, automobile horns, toys, alarm clocks, milk, sugar, and gelatin. The action marked the first use of the special powers obtained by the national union cabinet February 28, and followed a similar move yesterday when a new quota contingent system was announced for a long list of American products.

This announcement surprised American circles here, in view of the United States' announced suppression of the quota on French wines.

Secretary Sayre, of the State Department, in presenting an argument to the committee favorable to the passage of this bill, called attention to the fact that the delegation of power to the President in tariff matters was not a new idea, and he commented on the laws passed in 1794, 1802, 1815, 1828, 1890, 1892, 1897, 1909, and 1922. All of which specifically lodged in the President a particular authority with respect to foreign commerce. Anyhow, when this subject is boiled down to a nutshell and it is taken into consideration that some 65 nations have, according to the testimony presented to the committee, already put up trade barriers that are a menace to the United States, it means that, unless we scrap the old cumbersome machinery that makes necessary the holding of hearings and the finding of facts before any action can be taken, the horse will be stolen before we can have time to lock the barn.

It will also be interesting to some Members of the House to know that testimony was given to the committee which shows conclusively that when a shipment of a commodity is on the high seas, sold and billed to some concern in a nation where the government can, overnight, put on an embargo lifting the rates sky-high or do anything else desired, that such action may result in a great loss to the owner of the commodity.

One of the most prominent citizens who testified before the committee was Hon. Samuel Crowther, a writer of note, whose articles have appeared in the Saturday Evening Post and many other leading publications. I did not agree with his testimony; yet his viewpoint was indeed interesting, as apparently he is a nationalist and believes the time will come when the United States must be a self-contained Nation to the extent that it will be able to provide practically all the necessities of life for its citizens.

I took the occasion to question Mr. Crowther concerning the subject of wheat, cotton, and other commodities. He very frankly expressed the opinion that our export wheat market was already dead, and upon making an investigation I find that the total value of wheat exported last year amounted to only a little over $5,000,000. In answering my question concerning what was going to happen to cotton, he expressed an opinion which, it seems to me, justifies the passage of this legislation, and that was that the time was approaching when we would probably lose our export market, and there may be a lot of truth to his statement when it is taken into consideration that there are some 26,000,000 acres planted in cotton by the English colonies and it is proposed to increase this acreage to the extent of 20,000,000 more acres this year. Everyone realizes that the cost of labor is far less in other cotton-producing countries; and if this new acreage should produce one fourth of a bale per acre, it would add to the world supply an amount equal to 75 percent of the number of bales that we export annually. Nothing could be more disastrous to the cotton-producing sections of the United States than such a result. Therefore, if the export markets of the various commodities produced in this country are to be protected, there must be provided some quick, effective way to execute trades, and this can only be done, in view of the present machinery already established by 65 nations, by giving to the President of the United States the power that will enable him to make the kind of agreements that no nation would dare violate.

During this debate there will be presented all kinds of figures relating to export and import balances, yet the one fact remains that our business has been gradually falling away and this relates to percentages, so no one can successfully claim that the general depression that exists in some nations of the world is directly responsible.

In questioning Mr. Samuel Crowther, I asked him if he did not feel that if the nations of the world established a marketing place for the disposal of various kinds of products, would it not be favorable for our country to be represented by someone delegated with sufficient power to exercise the same? His answer, as I remember it, was that this was a new thought, and he would not care to answer it until he had given the same more study. Everyone realizes that a wholesale house sends its traveling salesmen out empowered to make prices and give discounts for the purpose of selling certain products; and if a competitor decides to sit on his own doorstep and wait for business, oftentimes the result is an action in bankruptcy. This is exactly the same situation that is prevalent today; and the percentage relating to our loss of business indicates that manufacturing plants, producers of agricultural products, and others are facing bankruptcy unless they can find some method of disposing of their surplus.

This House, a few days ago, passed the so-called "Bank-head bill"—a measure to levy a prohibitive tax on excess production of cotton. This Government has already curtailed the production of hogs, wheat, and other commodities, realizing full well that we were losing our farm markets; and if the price is to be maintained equal to the cost of production, there must be found some way to keep our citizens from producing more than can be sold.

During the hearings Mr. HILL, a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee from Washington, asked a certain question of Mr. O'Brien, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission—and by the way he is a Republican member, who, according to my viewpoint, has the right opinion concerning this legislation:

Mr. HILL. What can you tell us as to the tendency within recent years and at the present time toward trade-agreement bargaining among other nations outside of the United States?

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is growing like wildfire all over the world. It is in a way very much to be regretted as a world-wide policy, but I do not know what we can do about it. Since other nations are bartering and trading, if we want to get in on the deal we will have to do some bargaining and trading ourselves.

Mr. HILL. Is it necessary that our Government set up some agency for ready bargaining in order to keep pace with the trade-agreement movement throughout the world?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I believe so.

Mr. HILL. And if we do not set up such agency and do not confer power as in this bill it is provided, or in some other way, to enable some executive or administrative officer to carry out such negotiations and readily negotiate such agreements, the other nations will have the agreements all among themselves with us left out?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think that is the case today in the Denmark lard matter. I think the trouble with England, why we are not selling lard there, is there has been a special trade between them that gives Denmark a great advantage.

Mr. HILL. This world-wide tendency of these countries toward trade agreements and the readiness with which they can negotiate trade agreements render it necessary for this country to adopt some agency for trade agreements if we are to keep pace with the other countries?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I believe in that strongly.

Mr. HILL. Whatever may be said about our tariff policy as it applied during the last 150 years, we have reached the point now where, under existing conditions, if we are to keep pace with the rest of the world we must take action similar to the action they have taken with reference to negotiating trade agreements?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is correct.

Other distinguished gentlemen testified before the committee favoring the principles embodied in this legislation, and, to save my life, I cannot understand why the minority members of this committee cannot realize that unless some action be taken which will protect the producers of our country that sooner or later our commerce will be wiped off the seas.

The enactment of this bill into a law will not in any way destroy certain powers that now rest in the Tariff Commission, as section 336, which gives to the President authority to modify existing rates, is amended in such a manner that it will remain effective toward nations who do not make favored-nation treaties. In addition, section 338 will be effective toward nations that unjustly discriminate against the citizens of the United States; in addition the provisions included in the Public Works Act makes it possible to exercise the kind of jurisdiction that is necessary to levy different rates for the protection of commodities produced in the United States; yet these provisions of law do not provide any kind of machinery which would authorize the President to enter into a quick trade. When it is taken into consideration, the action announced by France against the United States a few days ago, one must realize the necessity of clothing the President with sufficient power to enter into trades for the purpose of removing unjust discriminations.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does not the gentleman know that in spite of all this enthusiasm shown by Mr. O'Brien, no country in the world has its imports and exports now up to where it had them in 1929?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I agree with the gentleman, but I may add further that our country has lost in percentages, and percentages are what count, and not the totals in dollars and cents. The percentages always show the trend of business, and there is no man on this floor or in this Nation who can dispute the accuracy of what I have just said.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But does not the gentleman know that that condition is absolutely attributable to the fact that all the nations of the world have put up their own tariff walls and are trying to do what we should do—look after our home markets.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I think if the gentleman will refer to the speech just delivered by my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], he will see cases cited that related to the various countries of South America, which showed that in the years gone by we had an increase in our export business where now we have a decrease, and this is not only true with respect to the South American countries, but it is equally true of all the nations with which we have had normal business in the past.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FULLER. Is it not a fact that all these nations that have adopted higher tariff rates in recent years have done so in retaliation for the American Smoot-Hawley tariff law?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am going to make my answer very short. I think the gentleman is exactly correct.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is probably the greatest authority on the oil question on the Ways and Means Committee—

Mr. McCLINTIC. I thank the gentleman for his compliment.

Mr. KNUTSON. I really believe that, and I follow the gentleman on the oil question, because I know he understands it. May I ask the gentleman this question? Does he really believe it would promote prosperity in Oklahoma and Texas and Kansas if we were to buy more oil in South America and produce less in the Southwest?

Mr. McCLINTIC. May I answer the gentleman by making this statement? Whenever we make it possible to negotiate trade agreements, then countries that are not producing oil will be able to sell or trade us something for our oil, and we will be able to carry on in a successful manner.

It will be remembered that recently our Government has announced a policy that relates to quotas; however, this was more or less a temporary program, and until we announce to the world that we expect to ask for our citizens the same consideration that is given to others, we cannot hope to produce and sell surplus of many of the products of this land in the future. At present there are a great many articles on the free list; if I am correctly advised, there is no method other than by legislation to levy a duty on such items. In taking into consideration the various proceedings that enter into a trade, I have always been of the opinion that the more freedom an agency could have, the better the result that could be obtained; and for this reason I raised the question in the committee as to whether or not this legislation could directly deal with those articles that are now coming in free of duty. The answer was given that the establishment of quotas would solve the situation, thus making it possible, if the President so desired, to refuse to enter into an agreement which would allow any article to come into the United States, which, in my opinion, is a distinct advantage to all the people, and especially the cotton farmers, as the time may come when other countries will levy high duties on export cotton; and unless we have some way to meet the situation, this business may be vitally affected.

Now, this bill does not establish a selfish policy to make some industry enormously rich, but to preserve the rights of different kinds of businesses in this country in such a way that we may continue to hold the high position that we held in the estimation of other countries prior to the enactment of the high protective tariff law. In other words, I try to put myself in the other fellow's place when it comes to the discussing of any subject. I know that other nations of the world have the right to make quick trades, to establish embargoes overnight that may destroy the value of a cargo at sea, and I should like for my country to have the same rights so that the honest producer will not be penalized by some unjust act of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect anything I may say on this bill, or, in fact, anything anyone else may say on this bill in the course of this debate, will have the slightest influence on the outcome of this legislation, because I believe that every Member has already made up his mind how he is going to vote. The only purpose we can serve is to record our views on it so that the public will know how we stand on legislation of this kind.

The bill now before the committee, H.R. 8687, is entitled "A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930."

This proposed legislation does not within itself undertake to modify, alter, or change in any way whatsoever a single tariff schedule or rate in the Tariff Act of 1930, yet in every sense of the word it is a complete tariff bill in every particular. It transfers to the Chief Executive the whole works. It authorizes him, without let or hindrance, to increase or lower any rate in the present tariff act within a range of 50 percent of the present rate and without reference to the difference in foreign and domestic costs. It also authorizes the Chief Executive, at his own will and pleasure, to enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof. It authorizes the Chief Executive to modify existing duties, existing import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions as may be required or proper to carry out any foreign trade treaty that the President may see fit to enter into. The exercise of all these powers and proclamations shall be in effect from and after the time they have been proclaimed and shall remain in effect until such time as the President may desire to discontinue them in whole or in part.

I cannot vote for this measure for the reason that I am convinced it is an attempt to transfer to the President of the United States legislative powers not authorized by the Constitution, repugnant to and directly in conflict with section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which states that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Throughout the 150 years' history of the country this constitutional power has rested in the legislative branch of the Government. To the present date, so far as history records, no President has ever asked that this authority be transferred to him or even suggested such a departure from traditional policy.

This proposed legislation, however, is just one further step in the direction of complete dictatorship that is now being rapidly approached by our Government; in fact, it is only truthful to say that this Government is now essentially a government by dictatorship. No other possible characterization can be made of it. I dare say that scarcely any Member of this House would say that he believes it was the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution, when they proposed section 8 of article I, above quoted, that the power to lay and collect imposts and duties, tariffs or taxes, was ever to be under control of other than the legislative branch of the Government. If any man is so bold as to entertain the thought that we in this country have not already been subjected to the rule of absolute dictatorship, let him undertake to embark upon any business venture. He will at once find himself surrounded by and checkmated with scores of heretofore unheard-of governmental bureaus, manned by high-powered subdictators, clothed with unlimited arbitrary authority, ready to place him in a governmental strait-jacket.

The proposed legislation is probably the most striking and forceful example of this that can be mentioned. We are living under the new deal and are paying a terrific price because of it. The liberties of the American people are daily being transferred from their chosen representatives to the executive branch of the Government on the basis that we are in the midst of an economic emergency and that traditional policies are to be cast aside. When this policy began a year ago it was claimed that it would be exercised only temporarily, and opposition to it was placated on that basis; but now no further claim is being made that this is a temporary policy. On the contrary, we are bluntly and plainly told by the "brain trust" that it is to become a part of our permanent system. Even the bill under consideration is permanent in its duration and makes no pretense at being a mere temporary emergency measure.

Leading authorities of our country and many of our ablest students of governmental affairs are alarmed at what they term a sort of "palace revolution" that is going on at the seat of our Government in Washington. One of these, Mark Sullivan, in a New York publication on March 4, 1934, said:

It is certain that the revolution now under way cannot go on to completion except by getting rid of the independence of the judiciary. The revolution cannot be made effective except by getting rid of the freedom of the press and by suppressing and punishing dissent and nonconformity as thoroughly as they were suppressed during the World War. The revolution cannot go on to completion except by getting rid of the parliamentary form of government; and these are but three of the fundamental American institutions that must pass away if the revolution is to be complete and remain permanent.

Another leading publisher who is known to be friendly to the present occupant of the White House, who vigorously supported his candidacy, and who is of the same political faith as the President, in a front-page editorial within the past 10 days, stated:

We are advancing fast toward absolutism. We are retreating fast from constitutional democracy. Encroachment after encroachment upon popular liberties follow one another.

Usurpation leads to further usurpation of dictatorial authority. The President seems to think he can easily enlarge his already extended powers by merely weaving into a request for new authorizations some passing references to the "existing emergency" and the "prevailing unemployment."

This is the familiar balustrade upon which he again leans in casually asking Congress for power personally to negotiate and conclude tariff treaties without their submission to the Senate for ratification, without recommendation or guidance by the Tariff Commission, without check from any quarter, without the concurrence of any other person or official body, without revealed method or proven principle or established precedent or even thorough survey of the facts.

Autocratic authority is so substituted for constitutional prerogatives or procedure.

If Congress, in its servile desire to surrender its functions, should confer more of its powers on the President, that power in this instance should be limited strictly to the right to raise tariff rates as a reprisal for prohibitive rates or quotas imposed by foreign nations on American products.

This power would be at least the right to defend American industry. But the power to lower tariff rates 50 percent is the power to destroy American industry. It is the power to cripple the 95 percent of production and employment which supplies domestic markets in order to favor the 5 percent which competes in foreign markets.

These are strong words to come from one of the President's own party—one known to have contributed to his political success.

As a Representative of a congressional district it is my duty to know, and I am interested in knowing, just how the exercise of the power conferred on the President by this bill may affect industry in my district and in my State. Southern California is probably the greatest citrus-producing section in the world. The potential capacity of that great southwest country to produce all kinds of citrus and most every kind of vegetable products is almost unlimited. The growing of these products is the major industry and enterprise of that section, which provides gainful employment and sustenance for three or four million people. This industry has been developed over a period of some 70 years of painstaking effort, research, and study. After successive experiences of success and failure over this long period of years this industry has learned from the valuable school of applied experience that it cannot compete with the same products which can and are now being produced in the countries along the Mediterranean Sea. It has been ascertained and proven to be a fact beyond any question of doubt that these Mediterranean countries can produce and transport to the center of the United States of America competitive citrus, vegetable, and other like products at a cost of one half or less the cost of production of these products in the United States.

These American products to which I refer have enjoyed intermittently and from time to time tariffs sufficiently adequate to enable them to compete successfully with the low cost of production of competitive countries. Within my personal knowledge, however, there have been periods when this industry had not proper rates of protection. As an outstanding example during that period of the Wilson administration when the so-called "Underwood tariff law" was in existence, the tariff on lemons was only one half of 1 cent per pound. I remember the protestations of the lemon growers that they could not market their products at a sufficient price to even pay the cost of transportation much less the cost of production, interest on their investment, and so forth. The country was flooded with lemons and other citrus products from Italy and Sicily. I distinctly remember driving along the highways through the Citrus Belt of southern California and seeing piles of the finest lemons and oranges that ever grew, and that would have filled hundreds of freight cars, dumped along the highways and in the waste spaces, that had been picked to save the trees and carted away from the groves and dumped by the wayside as a total loss. The American consumers were getting their lemons and oranges from Italy and nearby countries because they could be laid down here at less cost than ours. The producers, in a state of desperation, were pleading to their Government for a tariff on these products that would permit them to live. There are, in all probability, among those who today comprise the membership of this House, some who witnessed this same spectacle as they visited southern California during that period, and who will verify the correctness of what I am here stating.

Upon the passage of the Republican emergency tariff law in 1921, which placed on lemons a substantial tariff, as well as upon other citrus and agricultural products, this tragic situation disappeared, and from that day this industry has prospered under the protective policy and has expanded and developed into one of the major industries of the whole United States. Millions upon top of millions have been invested and there is room for more. More than a million

American citizens are dependent upon this industry for a livelihood.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read a letter that I have received from the California Almond Growers Exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

CALIFORNIA ALMOND GROWERS EXCHANGE,
San Francisco, Calif., March 19, 1934.

HON. WILLIAM E. EVANS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EVANS: This organization views with interest and some concern the introduction of a bill in the Congress to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. The present status of the almond-growing industry in this State, involving the livelihood of between five and six thousand orchardists, is due in a large measure to the very wise action of past Congresses in granting a considerable measure of protection to these growers against the importation of almonds from the Mediterranean Basin.

Under the auspices of the California Almond Growers Exchange from time to time the case of the almond growers has been presented to the Congress, backed up by records showing the actual differences in the costs of production and asking only for that measure of protection which would enable California almonds to compete on a basis of equality in the domestic market with imported nuts.

This has been recognized by the Congress, and while the measure of protection does not entirely equal the difference in the costs of production, nevertheless the quality of California almonds and the grades and standards, as well as the merchandising policies which have been fostered by the exchange, have enabled our growers to get an increasing share of this market without imposing a burden on the consuming public.

The exchange is of the opinion that the Congress should not forego its rights to tariff making, and that, as in the past, the Senate should reserve its right of passing on any reciprocal trade agreements, which, of course, must always involve the exercise of the treaty-making power of the Government.

No doubt you are familiar with historic efforts to promote and maintain such reciprocal agreements. Practically all of these agreements concerned agricultural products, highly competitive with those of other countries, which are eager to have the gates of our country opened to their cheaply produced crops.

This is particularly true of almonds and the other specialty crops raised exclusively in this State, or only in a few other States. These crops are not subject in the same degree to economic factors affecting the great major staple agricultural products of this country, but they do represent the chief means of livelihood of a great many thousands of American farmers who are surely entitled to equality of opportunity in seeking the domestic market for their products.

This attitude of the California Almond Growers Exchange is being expressed to you because we feel that in the coming discussion of this legislation you will want to have the opinion of your constituents directly interested in this issue.

Thanking you for your interest, and with best wishes, we are,
Sincerely yours,

By authority of board of directors of the California Almond Growers Exchange:

C. D. HAMILTON, President, Banning, Calif.
M. B. AYARS, Vice President, Paso Robles, Calif.
CHARLES DUMARS, Winters, Calif.
N. C. JESSEE, Chico, Calif.
H. C. MCMAHON, Marysville, Calif.
A. L. SCOFIELD, Merced, Calif.
GEORGE W. STURM, Orland, Calif.
JOHN H. WILLMS, Woodbridge, Calif.
HARRY J. WOOD, Modesto, Calif.
By T. C. TUCKER, Secretary.

Mr. EVANS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question that necessarily forces itself upon me is, Do I want the power to destroy these great industries and literally wreck the efforts and lives of hundreds of thousands of people, to be transferred to any one person who may, by a single stroke of the pen, without giving those interested an opportunity to be heard and without even permitting those interested to know that he may at his will or pleasure remove this arm of protection and suddenly subject them to utter ruin?

When a kindred proposal was before Congress 3 years ago, at the time the present tariff law was under consideration, scores of Members on the Democratic side of the House, many among the Democratic leaders, came on this floor and earnestly plead against conferring a much milder power upon the President under the flexible provisions of the tariff law. They said, in all earnestness and with emphasis, that even those limited powers, which could be exercised by the President only after a thorough investigation conducted by the Tariff Commission at which all parties interested had been heard, were entirely too much to confer upon any President, be he of either major party.

I have the highest regard and kindest feeling for the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—no finer gentleman ever presided over it—but in a speech made on May 17, 1929, in connection with the consideration of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] said:

In my opinion we have gone a long way too far already in the centralization of power in the Executive head of the Government. The President of the United States is now Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; and with the great concentration of power lodged in him, giving him indirect control over the railroads and the transportation system of the country through the Railroad Commission, control of the air communication by the Radio Commission, control of the navigable streams and water power, control of the finances of the country through the Federal Reserve Board and Farm Loan Board, and now domination over agriculture through the proposed new Farm Board, with a $500,000,000 revolving fund, every dollar of which will be expended by appointees of the President, and if this bill is enacted into law he will have the power of life and death over industry, all manufacturing enterprises, and complete autocratic power affecting agriculture.

Continuing, he said:

My friends, this is too dangerous and alarming to contemplate. With all this power vested in the President of the United States, he becomes a colossus. It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man who ever has been, is now, or ever will be President of the United States. In fact, with all this unrestricted and unlimited power he would be in a better position to overthrow our form of government and proclaim himself king than was the First Consul of France, the great Napoleon, when he overthrew the French Government and proclaimed himself Emperor.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a quotation from remarks by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] on this point?

Mr. EVANS. I will yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The tariff act was before the House, and I think it was on the conference report the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] said:

I know our Democratic friends will represent, as they have done in the past, that under the flexible provision we are abrogating the rights of Congress to write tariff rates. This is absolutely incorrect and incapable of proof. Whether a Republican or a Democrat holds the exalted position of President of the United States, he is chosen for that position by the will of the majority of the people, and the confidence of the country must be reposed in his judgment. To ask him to become simply a transmitting agency to the House of Representatives of the action of the Tariff Commission is a denial of the confidence of the people in his judgment and capacity.

Mr. EVANS. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is consistent.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. He is against this bill, and the argument that I have quoted is in favor of this bill.

Mr. EVANS. But he did not say that he was willing to go this far, as far as this bill goes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. First, I extend to the gentleman my sincere thanks for the very high compliment he has paid me as Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. Next, when I made that speech it was during peace times, under normal conditions, and we all know that during war times and abnormal conditions a different situation obtains, and we are now in a condition that is worse than was ever experienced during war. We know we must adopt extraordinary means to deal with extraordinary conditions. Then I again commend to my friend the comment of the great Lincoln, who said that wise men change their minds, but others never do.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I knew when I yielded to our fine chairman that he was going to come back to the Lincoln wisecrack, because I heard him use it under the same circumstances a few days ago.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I assure the gentleman that I do not mention that with reference to my friend from California.

Mr. EVANS. I understand that, but I must continue now with these very potent words of our distinguished chairman:

It seems that the more power men are given the more they are obsessed with a morbid gluttony for increased power. My friends, it is time to pause and call a halt, to stop, think, look, and listen before we go over the yawning precipice just ahead of us.

That yawning precipice which the gentleman saw in front of him was the flexible tariff law. The gentleman was certainly wrong when he made that speech, or he is wrong now when he is asking tenfold more power centralized in the Chief Executive.

These very same gentlemen are here today urging the passage, and will undoubtedly succeed in passing, this bill, which is a hundredfold more potential of dangerous abuse of the executive power than the provisions of the flexible tariff act. Under the present law the President can act only after a finding by an independent nonpartisan board that the difference in the cost of production justifies the change of rates.

The New York Journal of Commerce, under date of March 13 last, carried an extended article in which it was stated in substance that, anticipating the enactment of this legislation, high official representatives of the administration were now in Mexico and other Latin American countries soliciting new import trade agreements under which it is proposed to import into this country annually some 30,000 additional carloads of fresh vegetables, which will of necessity come in direct competition with the vegetable growers of the southern coast and Gulf sections of the United States. It should not be difficult to see what this will do for American vegetable producers, but the sponsors of this "new-deal" policy say, "What is the difference? If these foreign producers are more efficient and can produce at less cost, why not let them furnish us these products and we will in turn furnish them such of our products as we may be more efficient in producing than they are."

In other words, a policy of the survival of the fittest is to be applied to all industry throughout the world, which means that the small, struggling American industry, whether agricultural or otherwise, will have to give way to foreign producers, who by the advantage of low costs of production can prove themselves more efficient. This bill is designed to empower the President to lower tariffs to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot subscribe to this policy, and the reason I cannot is that I believe in preserving American resources for Americans. If this bill becomes law, no business can be assured that its products will remain protected one day, nor will those interested have a word to say in protest to any action the President may take.

But the sponsors of this bill say that the President, in his wisdom, will never make such a ridiculous agreement as would permit such a situation to arise. No one can be certain of what may arise in our economic situation as it is today. The President may be actuated by the most laudable purposes and will undoubtedly be moved by the best intentions, but the President is no more than human and may make serious blunders if permitted to act on his own responsibility alone in a matter embodying such great and complicated ramifications. The air-mail fiasco of a few weeks ago is an outstanding example of what may happen in the exercise of arbitrary power. The most colossal blunder the Government has made in a decade—the cancellation of these air-mail contracts without giving those who had all at stake an opportunity to be heard. Now that this fine service has been practically destroyed and the lives of 11 fine young Army officers needlessly sacrificed, it has become known to unbiased minds that no actionable fraud was connected with the letting of the contracts. And suppose the contracts had been reeking with fraud. Surely those immediately connected with this service were entitled to be heard. Our law guarantees this right even to the guilty. It shows the danger of arbitrary power. If this bill becomes a law many a business may suffer the same sad fate the air-mail contractors suffered.

Let us see what is in the mind of his Cabinet officials. The Secretary of Agriculture testified before the Ways and Means Committee on this bill. The burden of his testimony was that there were a lot of so-called, by him, "inefficient" industries in this country that could not sustain any economic justification of their existence, and that it was a mistaken economic policy to coddle these industries under a protective tariff shed to the exclusion of similar products from foreign markets which were more efficient. I say this was the trend of his testimony. Let me quote from it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Suppose you put every lace and curtain factory of the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania out of business by this reciprocal method, how big an impression on the exportation of our goods will that make by bringing those few lace curtains into this country? Now if that is the reciprocal trade you men want to get, let us understand it.

Mr. WALLACE. On the other hand, sir, a domestic expansion in these inefficient industries will cause unemployment in the efficient industries and in our export agriculture.

Now, because of the fact there have been these groups, representing in total a very small percentage of our population, but highly organized groups for impact on Congress, it is because of that we have got in this terrible muddle, creating tremendous injustice to our more efficient—and most of our people are efficient—our more efficient exporting industries and reacting through them on this great eastern section of the population. I feel if you had responded less to these small groups, inefficient from the world point of view, that your own cities would be enormously more prosperous than they are today.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, Mr. Secretary, you speak of inefficient small industries. Take a community, say of 50,000 people with a factory in it employing three or four thousand hands; how would you class that? Where are you going to draw the line of distinction both as to inefficiency and smallness?

Mr. WALLACE. May I refer you to the statement I made earlier in response to a question of the chairman, that of our total gainfully employed population of, say, 48,000,000, about 5,000,000 are employed by the factories of the type that might be affected to some extent by lower tariffs. I would say that that is a relatively small group; considering the gains that would accrue to the rest of the population.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think, Mr. Secretary, when you refer to small industries, if that is the type of industry it is proposed to put out of business by these reciprocal agreements and treaties, you are vitally hitting perhaps not a center of population but a very vital part of the population of this country—when you are centering your efforts to destroy industry in New England. Now let us be fair and frank about it. We have a great many small industries—under the definition you are giving us, they are small—but are not men and women employed in those industries entitled to a livelihood and not to be obliged to move out from their homes, which they have inherited from generation to generation, and to go to some big center, in order to let in some of this type of goods you are talking about—lace curtains from abroad?

Mr. WALLACE. Are they inefficient, sir?

It is perfectly clear as to what was in Mr. Wallace's mind when he made that statement. That last shot he took at Mr. TREADWAY is most significant. "Are they inefficient, sir?" That means, Mr. Chairman, that upon the passage of this bill inflated, high-powered Government officials will sweep out over this country and say to the little so-called "one-horse" manufacturer, industrialist, or what not, "You are inefficient. You could not stay in business unless you had this outrageously high tariff hovering over you. So you will have to get out and let some more efficient concern of Czechoslovakia or elsewhere produce the stuff you are producing; they are more efficient. This is a day of the survival of the fittest, applied to industry on a world-wide basis."

The Secretary of Agriculture gave the public a statement, in which he proposed an economic policy for this country, a few weeks ago entitled "America Must Choose." Every American should read and understand his words. Let me quote just a small part of this article, wherein he undertakes to tell us what is ahead. The Secretary is a member of the "Brain Trust", so reported, and he and Professor Tugwell, the chairman of the Trust, are said to have taken the lead in the drafting of this bill. The Secretary said:

Much as we all dislike them, the new types of social control that we have now in operation are here to stay. * * * By the end of 1934 we shall probably have taken 15,000,000 acres out of cotton, 20,000,000 acres out of corn, and about half a million acres out of tobacco, nearly one eighth of all the crop land now harvested in the United States.

If we continue year after year with only 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 acres of cotton in the South, instead of 40,000,000 acres or 45,000,000 acres, it may be necessary after a time to shift part of the southern population. We will find exactly the same dilemma, although not on quite such a great scale, in the Corn and Wheat Belts.

If we finally go all the way toward nationalism, it may be necessary to have compulsory control of marketing, licensing of plowed land, and base and surplus quotas for every farmer for every product for each month in the year. We may have to have Government control of all surpluses, and a far greater degree of public ownership than we have now. It may be necessary to make a public utility out of agriculture. * * * Every plowed field would have its permit sticking upon its post.

DISCIPLINE NEEDED

As yet, we have applied in this country only the barest beginnings of the sort of social discipline which a completely determined nationalism requires. * * * It is quite as serious a question whether we have the resolution and staying power to swallow all the words and deeds of our robust individualist past, and submit to a completely army-like, nationalist discipline in peace time.

Our own maneuvers of social discipline to date have been mildly persuasive and democratic. * * * Regimentation without stint might indeed, I sometimes think, go farther and faster here than anywhere else. * * * Great prosperity is possible for the United States if we follow the strictly nationalist course, but in such case we must be prepared for a fundamental planning and regimentation of agriculture and industry far beyond that which anyone has yet suggested. To carry out such a program effectively, with our public psychology as it is, may require a unanimity of opinion and disciplined action even greater than that which we experienced in the years 1917-19. * * * It may require a great amount of governmental aid to take care of people formerly engaged in import and export businesses. It will mean the shifting of millions of people from the farms of the South. But these are minor considerations, in comparison with the extraordinarily complete control of all the agencies of public opinion which is generally necessary to keep the national will at a tensility necessary to carry through a program of isolated prosperity.

These, Mr. Chairman, are prophetic admonitions. The American people—farmers and others in small communities—will be moved about like soldiers, having no choice in where they may live or what they may do to earn a living. We will be building up our great centers of population, according to the Secretary, instead of allowing the people to remain in the healthful surroundings of the country or small towns of their preference.

The Secretary is giving a mild warning to the American people of what they may expect in the application of his scheme of planned economy, which means nothing more or less than absolute Government control of all industry. He tells us that it means the carrying out of stricter rules of discipline than we experienced in 1917-19, during the World War. Most people believe that war-time authority is great enough for most any emergency, but these gentlemen are headed for still greater power than is necessary in time of war. He does not stop here. He says it will require unanimity and discipline of opinion to carry out this rule of Government control. In other words, the traditional policy of the freedom of the press is no barrier in the wake of the new deal dictators. They must have absolute control, and the freedom of the press must yield to their power.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, was drawn and handed to this Congress in its present form by the men who advocate these new, socialistic, and un-American reforms. It is just one step further in the direction of the new dictatorship, Government ownership, and socialism. It takes from the legislative branch of the Government a constitutional function which it has exercised for 150 years. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, back of every question which assumes such proportion as this tariff question assumes there is a certain fundamental background, and I do not think we can properly do justice to the consideration of a question such as this unless we include in that consideration a consideration of the background. There are certain natural laws of economics the reaction of which cannot be refuted by any collection of statistics or trick figures. They are as certain in their workings and as inevitable in their results as are the movement of the planets in their orbits. To disregard these laws is as disastrous to the welfare of economics as is the disregard of the laws of hygiene dangerous to the health of the human body.

The ascent of mankind from the stage of savagery commenced when he began to exchange those of his commodities which he could secure the most easily for those commodities which were difficult for him to obtain. The members of one tribe were hunters and were skilled in the capture of game. Living upon an unbalanced diet of game, they did not develop far mentally or physically beyond the state of the cave man. Other tribes were adept at fishing and lived upon a diet of fish. Others, because of their location and the industry of their women, eked out a meager livelihood by primitive agriculture. Each tribe also became proficient in utilizing the various byproducts of game, fish, and plants for weapons, clothing, utensils, and dwellings.

By the fact that each was limited in its scope of endeavor by the nature of its supplies, development was necessarily slow. Savage wars resulted in the endeavor of each tribe to procure by conquest certain commodities which they considered necessities. The time, energy, and thoughts of men were so occupied by the procurement of necessities and by war that they could devote none of their energies toward advancement. Because of this continual strife, it was impossible for a tribe to have a settled abode or for any member of the tribe to accumulate possessions beyond the ability of the individual to transport easily upon his person. The instinct of acquisitiveness was present but latent.

After some centuries of this kind of existence it dawned upon the feeble mind of some savage fisherman, that if he could exchange his surplus fish for the surplus game or surplus fruit of some of the neighboring tribes, he could vary his diet more easily than by fighting for it. One who subsisted by natural agriculture gained the idea that he could trade some surplus baskets for the pelts of animals. It was tried and proved to be mutually advantageous. Thus began peaceful intercourse, and tribes began to learn the language of other tribes. This made possible an interchange of ideas.

Tribes drawn together by common interests of exchange and problems of defense and cemented by a common language developed into nations. The problem of obtaining enough to eat and wear was simplified, better protection was assured, and then began the domestication of plants and animals. Storage and conservation of surplus became possible, and periods of famine became less frequent. As the problem of escaping starvation and destruction by warfare became less acute, man began to turn his mind toward an easier mode of living and the development of comforts. Art and personal adornment followed. Then followed slowly a system of education.

By the coordination of the energies of individuals roads and bridges were constructed. Beasts of burden became common, and that wonderful engine of civilization—the wheel—was invented. Small crafts grew into boats, then to ships. By this time it was quite obvious that if the interchange of commodities would improve the condition of individuals and tribes, it would also improve the condition of nations. International commerce became common and the existence of hitherto unknown commodities became known. A medium of exchange was developed by virtue of necessity. Mankind developed a desire for luxuries as well as for necessities and comforts.

It was quite natural, in this process of evolution, that each tribe or nation should produce those articles of commerce which it possessed the natural resources to produce the most easily. This is according to one of the natural inclinations of humanity—to follow the path of least resistance. This has always been the most natural trend in the world. The law of supply and demand also operated perfectly, because it was a natural law and was not interfered with by manipulation. The markets of the world possessed both buyers and sellers, and because of this healthy condition international trade flourished. From time to time these trade relations were interrupted by wars, but soon after the resumption of peace the old law of supply and demand operated to restore the former activities between nations.

The first trade barriers were physical and natural ones. Nations were content to remain within the limit of their economic possibilities. They specialized in that merchandise which they could produce the most economically and exchanged it for merchandise which other nations could produce more economically. They bought from other nations and they were consequently able to sell to other nations. This made for conservation of effort and both nations benefited by the transaction. After a time a new factor was injected into the situation of international trade. This was the tariff. This being purely an artificial factor was bound to create disturbance.

Then came the World War, which, owing to the advance in armament and mechanics, interfered with world commerce to a degree which was a revelation to the world. At the end of the war, among the other facts which had been made plain, far above all others, was this: Any nation which depends upon any other nation for any appreciable amount of its important commodities is at the mercy of that nation in time of war. This is an alarming fact, and as soon as it became generally understood a desperate effort was made by all nations to become as nearly self-sufficient as possible. In order to further this movement protective tariff walls were erected; free trade has become a thing of the past, and international division of production has diminished to the point where the laws of economy are no longer operative.

The effort to increase the security of nations by rendering them self-sufficient has not been a success as a general thing. It is only possible in the case of a very few nations, and in these cases can never be fully accomplished. The movement has resulted in seriously curtailing international commerce, because it has filled the markets of the world with those wishing to sell merchandise but has taken the purchasers of merchandise away. In such an unhealthy condition it is impossible for international commerce to flourish. Production within nations has been developed to the point where home markets are supersaturated and huge surpluses have accumulated. It is one of the laws of economics that the price of a product depends upon the price of the surplus of that product; therefore because of this surplus merchandise is cheap. In order to compete still cheaper merchandise must be produced.

There are three methods of producing cheap merchandise—they rank as follows: Cheap labor, mass production, or a combination of cheap labor and mass production. The world as a whole is working under the last of these methods. Cheap labor lessens the buying power of the worker. Mass production produces still more surplus which is thrown upon a falling market. This surplus forces the prices of commodities lower. In order to compete industry must increase production and at the same time install labor-saving machinery and lower wages. This is burning the candle at both ends.

Interchange of commodities began with the desire of man for more necessities. It grew when this desire developed into the desire for comforts, and the instinct of acquisitiveness began to assert itself. It flourished when this desire grew into the demand for comforts and the desire for luxuries. It flourished abundantly when mankind demanded both comforts and luxuries, and mankind is at this position along the road of evolution today in regard to his desires and inclinations. Just as the development of the body of an individual may be disturbed by the abnormal development of some one of the glands of the body, even so has the evolution of the human race been disturbed by the abnormal development of the instinct of acquisitiveness.

Throughout the process of evolution, even as nations assisted by fortunate combinations of circumstances specialized and became proficient along certain lines of industry, likewise certain individuals within these nations assisted by fortunate combinations of circumstances became more proficient along certain lines of endeavor. The development of certain instincts was more prominent in some of these individuals than in others. The acquisitive instinct developed to a higher degree among small numbers and these aided by conditions, acquired the power to control trade relations, both within and without their nations. The interests represented by these individuals, under the plea of protection of home industry and domestic labor, have long been engaged in the erection of tariff barriers among the markets of the world. Following the World War they were further aided in their endeavors by the desire of all nations to achieve self-sufficiency. We see the result of their handiwork. The markets of the world are in a stagnated condition. Every one is seeking to sell. No one wishes to buy. Wages are low. There is a vast surplus of labor. The buying power of the entire world has been seriously curtailed. Certainly no one can maintain that this is prosperity. Surely no one can defend the system responsible for this condition or assert the desirability for its continuance.

We can only achieve prosperity by restoring the buying power of the masses of the people. Comforts and even luxuries of yesterday are necessities of today. Necessities of the future are as yet undreamed of. It is a fact of history that the desires of mankind will be fulfilled as they develop—providing a medium of exchange is available—and they will never cease to develop. The satisfaction of the demands of humanity will employ labor, which being employed will develop more desires. This is one of the cycles upon which the universe operates and, if uninterrupted by artificial manipulation, needs no more regulating than does the solar system.

This question of the readjustment of tariffs is the most important question before the country today. To recover from this depression we must, in connection with other nations, restore the markets of the world to a healthy condition. We have millions of unemployed, and their earning power must be reestablished. In order to do so we must increase our exports. The only way in which we can do this is to increase our imports. If we are to sell our surplus products abroad we must be paid for them in American dollars. No foreign money will discharge obligations in the United States. It is quite obvious in the light of the present condition of foreign credits that we cannot loan money abroad in order that foreigners may purchase from us. We have had enough of that.

There is only one other way to put our money in the hands of foreign merchants. That is to buy their merchandise. Every dollar spent in foreign lands eventually will return to the United States to purchase American products. That is as inevitable as the movement of the stars in the firmament. No economist can deny it. A merchant may take American money abroad and purchase foreign money with which he purchases foreign products. The man who by this transaction acquires the American dollars cannot convert them into foreign products or real estate except by exchanging them for foreign money. In the due course of events they must return to the United States to purchase American merchandise.

The usual argument is that every purchase of foreign merchandise by American dollars curtails the opportunity for Americans to make and sell these goods. This is quite true. On the other hand, it does provide an opportunity for Americans to make and sell other goods; because the foreign merchant who sells has a medium of exchange which he must spend in America. This produces a sale for American goods produced in America by American workingmen.

The advantage of such a transaction is more profit, hence more employment and higher wages to both parties in the transaction. This was the primary reason for exchange of commodities between individual tribes and nations from the very beginning of commerce. That reason is still as logical as ever.

When one man buys from another it is because he can do so more advantageously than he can produce the goods himself. History proves to us that because of certain conditions peculiar to certain sections, certain commodities can be produced more cheaply and of better quality than they can be produced anywhere else. For instance, it would be possible by the erection of greenhouses for Pennsylvania to produce pineapples or bananas of a kind. It would, however, be exceedingly uneconomical. By producing the proper artificial conditions it would be possible for those sections producing bananas or pineapples to produce apples, but at a prohibitive cost. Certainly it is more advantageous for these two sections to purchase these commodities from each other. This illustration is an exaggerated one, but applies in some degree to any line of industry. Those who can produce the most economically can sell the cheaper. There can be no denying this fact. Efforts to compete where competition is uneconomical results in a lowering of wages.

Labor is the sufferer, and because of the reduction of the buying power of labor the Nation and the world also suffers. No one can deny that the prosperity of the Nation is directly dependent upon the prosperity and buying power of the laboring classes.

This question of a tariff policy is a complicated one. It is one calling for careful research and for decisions uninfluenced by any sectional desires. It is one to be considered from a world-wide viewpoint, and must be approached in this manner. Consideration must also be given to the protection within countries of certain essential industries and in the United States to maintaining our present high standard of living. The percentage of return for labor in industry must also ever be borne in mind, as under our present system labor has never received its just and fair share of the profits of industry. The greed and rapaciousness which is due to the acquisitive instinct of man must be curbed in order to insure that labor shares in the spread.

This is not a matter which can be satisfactorily disposed of in Congress. No Congressman has the time to make a detailed study of this matter in order to acquaint himself with the facts. Congress as a body does not have time to take up the consideration of such an intricate question and to do it justice. It is a matter for slow and careful consideration. It must be gone into cautiously, step by step, with the idea of a general plan. Congress cannot do this, for in this country the tariff is to each Member of Congress a local issue. The tariff has always been a logrolling issue. Such an issue can have no general plan, and without a general plan the issue can never be settled. We must have a national tariff policy. At the present time we can have it in no other way except by giving the authority to formulate it to the President. Other Presidents have seen the necessity for this and have advocated it. The influence of the lobbyist for the powerful exponents of a high tariff must no longer be allowed to stand in the way of the peace and industrial recovery of the world. If they continue to do so, it is only a matter of time until a world-wide deluge of the unemployed and oppressed of all nations will break forth and engulf all those within whom the instinct of acquisitiveness has developed into a cancer of avariciousness, which has erased from their hearts and minds all consideration of the rights of humanity in general. If this time ever comes, as it may, the responsibility will rest upon those who by their lack of sympathy for their fellow man, their insatiable greed and lust for power, have made the conditions of the masses of the people unbearable. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 8687, to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill H.R. 7513, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H.R. 7478) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5863. An act to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or Territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription.

The message also announced that the Senate requests the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1699) to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or Territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 7599) to provide emergency aid for the repair or construction of homes and other property damaged by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in 1933 and 1934, disagreed to by the House, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McAdoo, Mr. LONERGAN, and Mr. KEYES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck].

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, the consent just given me to revise and extend my remarks will relieve me of the necessity of making, as I had hoped to do, an argument at some length and in some detail as to whether there is any constitutional power in the Congress to transfer its taxing power to the President. I had indulged the hope that I would have that opportunity, but for several reasons, including permission to extend, I shall not at this late hour Saturday afternoon thus impose upon my indulgent colleagues. In the first place, the time now allotted to me for such an argument is too short, and I would be like the old farmer in New York State who entered his farm nag in the Saratoga races. When his horse came in last he was asked to explain his poor showing. He replied that "the course was too long and the time was too short." [Laughter.]

That is true of the length and breadth of a subject as great as the fundamental question of taxation, and it is also peculiarly applicable to the time allotted to me.

In the second place, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway], although not a lawyer, has made such an admirable argument against the constitutionality of this measure that I am afraid that if I attempted to argue along the same lines I would simply be repeating that which he said with greater deliberation, and presumably, therefore, with greater precision.

But the third reason is the consciousness that has been borne upon me ever since my service in the House of Representatives as to the futility of any argument as to the constitutional powers of Congress or as to the sanctity of the Constitution itself, so far as voting is concerned. I do not doubt that many Members of this House do take what is an academic and sentimental interest in the Constitution as it came from the master architects of our Government, but, as far as affecting a single vote is concerned, I have yet to discover that any effort of mine or any effort of any other Member of the House has ever changed a vote in respect to a question, where the doubt was purely that of constitutional power.

In this connection I am reminded of the facility with which changes of opinion can take place in matters of constitutional powers, although they concern the oath that we all take when we come into this House to defend and protect the Constitution of the United States.

Today an extraordinary change has taken place on the Democratic side of the aisle, to which already the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS] has made extended and most effective reference. I refer to it again because it brings to my mind an experience—I will not say of some bitterness, because it is more amusing than otherwise. In 1929 a far more defensible proposition was under consideration of this House to vest such a power in the President upon advice of the Tariff Commission, a legislative auxiliary of Congress in the function of imposing taxes. When that proposition was made in 1929 I recall the vigorous attack that was made by the entire Democratic side of that Congress against this lesser and more defensible proposition, which it regarded as subversive of our institutions. I was so impressed with the arguments then made by the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DOUGHTON] and by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who closed the debate, and by our former colleague, Mr. Crisp of Georgia, and by the Democratic floor leader, Mr. Garner, that I concluded that the Democratic view was right, and, somewhat, to the consternation of my Republican colleagues and possibly to the surprise of my constituency, I made a speech on May 22, 1929, in which I supported the Democratic view. Now I am left alone, like a deserted and forlorn bride on the church steps. [Laughter.] I stand today, where I stood then, in defense of the constitutional prerogatives of Congress. The Democratic Party has deserted me. Why did they then strain at a gnat, now to swallow a camel? You will remember Lady Teazle said to her would-be seducer, "It may be well to leave honor out of the question." So in this matter the Democratic members of this House must leave consistency out of the question. [Laughter.] I appreciate we cannot always be consistent for we are all in the swift current of events which may be likened to the River Mississippi in a period of a spring freshet, where the muddy stream is overflowing the boundaries of the river and pours on to some unknown destination in muddy swirls and eddies.

I quite appreciate, therefore, that under the tremendous impact of this economic depression it may be no impeachment either of the sincerity or patriotism of the Democratic Members of the House that they are today taking a precisely opposite position to the one which they took in the preceding Congress, when a far more defensible proposition was under consideration. However, they could be at least more modest in advocating today what they attacked in 1929 and less enthusiastic in surrendering the prerogatives of Congress. Of course, it only goes to prove that the age of miracles has not passed [laughter]; because, while it was a miracle when Paul went to Damascus and was stricken with a strange light and forthwith he, the persecutor of the brethren, became their foremost apostle, is not the collective conversion of the Democratic side of this House, which we are now witnessing, a greater miracle?

There is another reason why I have done the House the great kindness of not making the argument as to constitutionality that I had in mind, but am contenting myself with some more general observations. We are living in strange times, when one can no longer with any confidence make predictions as to what the Supreme Court will do. I am confident that the Supreme Court, if it adhered to its decisions of many years, could not find any justification in the Constitution for the complete and absolute transfer of the taxing power upon imports from the Congress, where the Constitution placed it, to the Executive; but I say we are living in extraordinary times, when not merely Congress and the Executive are floating down this swollen and seemingly irresistible stream of events, to which I referred, but even the Supreme Court seems to be finding difficulty in resisting the fearful current of a world catastrophe.

Until a month ago it had been the settled rule of that Court, recognized in many decisions—a perfect beadrill of authority—that there was a clear distinction between a natural monopoly that was impressed with a public use, and the ordinary avocations of men. As to the former it was within the legislative power, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment, to regulate the rates that could be charged by these natural monopolies; but as to the latter, as to the larger number of men who deal in the necessities of life, like milk, bread, coal, wheat, or cotton, the Court had for a half century consistently held that there was no power, in view of the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment, in a State, to determine at what price an individual could sell his product.

When a month ago the Supreme Court of the United States, in the so-called "New York Milk case", calmly discarded its decisions of 50 years, and did not even pay to those decisions the ceremonious respect of a funeral oration, it laid down the principle that not only in respect of natural monopolies, but in respect of all the products of human labor the State has a power to determine the price at which a man shall sell. I regard that decision as astounding and disconcerting as any decision since the Dred Scott decision. The latter abrogated a political settlement of over 30 years; the former discarded decisions of a half century, and virtually expunged the fourteenth amendment from the Constitution for most practical or conceivable purposes. Therefore I would not risk the little reputation I may have in this House as a prophet by denying the possibility that this great Court might not, as a concession to the times, accept this law, if it should arise in a litigated case.

Does our responsibility end with the assumption that the Supreme Court might, especially if it were called upon to decide the constitutionality of this law under the present abnormal conditions, sustain the law? Does our responsibility then end?

There are two great fields of constitutional law. In one of them the Congress has primary responsibility, but the Supreme Court has the ultimate and final decision. Those are the constitutional questions that are said to be justiciable; and therefore, when such a question comes before the Court in a litigated case, the Court can only compare the statute with the Constitution and, if the statute conflicts therewith, declare it invalid.

But the one thing that we often ignore, not only in this House but in all public discussions, is that outside of the field of purely juridical constitutional law there is a vast field of governmental action, in which the most important constitutional questions can be raised, and in this field of power the Congress has not only the primary but it is the ultimate and exclusive authority, and the Supreme Court is incompetent to act. I refer to the field of what are called political or nonjusticiable questions. For example, it is undoubtedly true that when Congress was given the power to make appropriations to enable the Executive to function, that the constitutional duty was put upon the Congress to pass the appropriations; but if Congress refuse to do so, the question would be nonjusticiable, because fulfillment of that duty rests in the conscience of the Congress and could not possibly be the subject of a judicial decision. The only appeal is to the people.

Assume that the Supreme Court would accept an absolute delegation of the taxing power to the Executive to be exercised by the President in the form of a treaty without the consent of the Senate—and in ordinary times it never would—yet it does not alter the fact that upon the Members of this House is the responsibility, under our solemn oath of office, to determine in the light of the Constitution and according to the basic principles of English-speaking liberty, of which the Constitution is but one expression, whether we are prepared to turn our backs upon 500 years of struggles for liberty by the English-speaking race and vest an absolute power of taxation in respect to imports in the Executive. This question was the origin of the British Parliament, well and properly known as the "Mother of Parliaments." Parliament came into existence because the English people were not content that the Crown could impose any tax without the consent of the representatives of the people. And that struggle has gone on from the time of the Plantagenets down to King George V, because in the last crisis in English history, involving the attempt of the House of Lords to reject a budget that had been passed by the House of Commons, Prime Minister Asquith advised the King that if necessary the King must appoint enough peers to give a liberal majority in the House of Lords to sustain the right of the House of Commons to impose taxes; and, ultimately, as you know, the crisis was solved without such an extraordinary act on the part of the King; and it was solved by the reaffirmation of the principle, that a money bill must be the subject of action by the House of Commons and could not be transferred or vested in any other body.

Go back to our own Revolution, which made us a Nation. We did not object to regulations of commerce by Great Britain. We did object to the attempt to tax us by legislative assemblies in which we had no representative; and it was for that principle that we fought seven long years; for that the agonies of Valley Forge were endured, and the crowning triumph of Yorktown was gained. Yet, now, in a moment of hysteria, for that is what it is, in an economic crisis (undoubtedly grave, but not so grave as the crisis of which the Constitution was born), not so grave as other crises in American history in which the industries of this country were far more prostrated, we are prepared to abandon a basic rule of taxation and also a fundamental principle of our Constitution that no treaty, that shall bind the faith and credit of the United States to a course of action with another government, shall be valid unless it have the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate.

We are thus confronted with the possibility of a double violation of the Constitution.

Please remember that there is no question about the President's power to negotiate all the trade treaties he wants, because his power of negotiation is as surely vested in him as is the power that Congress exercises to impose taxes, but when he negotiates, and he can negotiate with any nation for reciprocal exchange of imports and of duties upon imports, he must return it to the Senate for its approval, and if it involves changes in taxation it must be returned to the House, because the power to originate any tax is the ancient privilege of the House of Representatives and the final power to impose the tax, whether in accord with a trade agreement or not, is the greatest of all prerogatives of Congress itself. Therefore, there is no objection to the President, if he feels he can improve our economic situation, making a tariff treaty with Germany, with France or any other nation; but we do object to the President's having the final authority without submitting it to the Congress of the United States and to that body of the Congress which has the peculiar right to say when we shall commit ourselves to binding agreements with other governments in matters of legislative policy.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BECK. I know there are many trade agreements that do not require either the action of the Senate or the action of the Congress, because they are trade agreements of a peculiarly executive character. And there is the line of distinction. You may have an agreement that if such-and-such country will provide certain facilities for the entrance of our vessels we will do the same thing in our ports of entry, or any other method of commercial comity between nations, but when an act essentially legislative is involved, and the highest of all legislative powers is the power to impose a tax—you cannot destroy the right of the Senate to concur and the right of the Congress to impose the tax stipulated by calling it a trade agreement, because this would be merely juggling words and would not answer the quite obvious intention of the Constitution.

There is no room in the American system for one-man power, and this was decided at a time when we had a leader who could, if anyone, have claimed one-man power, although he never did—that man of incomparable virtue, probity, and sagacity, the first President of the United States—but it was not proposed to give any such power to the President of the United States, even though he were George Washington. Therefore all legislative power was vested in a Congress by the Constitution.

The executive power was vested in a President, and the Executive was to be limited in his negotiations and conduct of foreign relations by the provision that not merely a majority of the Senate but two thirds of the Senate must concur before the freedom and independence of this country was compromised, because every treaty in a measure compromises the independent action of a country. I do not mean that this ought not to be so. I simply say if I agree with another man I will do a thing, as a man of honor, I have limited my own independence of action by the obligation of my promise, and so a nation limits its independence when it agrees in a treaty that it will take a certain course of action. Therefore the framers of the Constitution were not willing, unless two thirds of the Senate concurred, that there should be any commitment of this country to a future course of action with any nation. They made no exception in the matter of taxes. The commitment was just as applicable as to what duties should be imposed with reference to taxes as upon any other subject.

Mr. BECK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think before the gentleman takes his seat he should explain to the House the difference between a so-called "trade agreement" between nations and a treaty between nations, because, after all, any agreement between nations seems to me to be a treaty. If there is a difference, I hope the gentleman will give the House the benefit of his views on the question.

Mr. BECK. I have tried to do so in what I have already said by stating that whether the treaty or the trade agreement is one that must go to the Senate depends upon whether it relates to matter that the Constitution has committed to the executive branch of the Government; but when it refers to matter that requires action of a legislative character, it does not matter how you label it. Our State Department is the organ of our foreign affairs and can make many agreements with foreign countries of an executive character that do not require the concurrence of the Senate, but when you come to examine them, you find they are all parts of the executive function in seeing that the laws are faithfully administered and in the conduct of our relations with foreign countries.]

Let us stand by the Government of the fathers and trust to the composite patriotism and intelligence of the Congress of the United States. It may err, it often does. It may be inefficient, it often is inefficient; but its wisdom is better than the wisdom of any one man and we will find it out sooner or later. [Applause.]

I now yield to my friend from North Carolina.

[Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman is learned in the Constitution, able and adroit in debate, but it appears to me that the gentleman strains the point by using the term with respect to this bill "imposing taxes." What is there in this bill that authorizes the President to impose any new taxes? He may raise or lower the present tax, as he can under section 336 of the present law, but he cannot impose any tax, and the gentleman has used that term more than once.

Mr. BECK. I used it because, if you will look through form to substance, that is the effect.

Let us suppose the tax on sugar is 3 cents a pound—I do not know what it is.

Mr. KNUTSON. Two and twenty one-hundredths cents.

Mr. BECK. Let me use 3 cents for the purpose of illustration. When the Congress says that the tax shall be 3 cents a pound on sugar and then gives to the President, whether under the old Tariff Commission or without the Tariff Commission, as this law provides, the power, either to increase that to 4½ cents a pound or to decrease it to 1½ cents a pound, then this has happened: Congress has only nominated a tax, the President has ultimately determined it, and especially if he increases the tax to 4½ cents per pound, he has imposed a tax to the extent of 1½ cents a pound.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I know the distinguished gentleman can differentiate between increasing or lowering a tax and imposing a tax. I know the gentleman can distinguish between the two propositions. We all understand what is meant by increasing or decreasing a tax, but the gentleman used the words "imposing a tax" and used them more than once, and I maintain that in this bill there is no power given to the President to impose any tax.

Mr. BECK. If the President does not impose a tax after he has made his agreement with foreign nations, who does?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The tax is already imposed by the Congress, and the President can raise or lower it to the extent of 50 percent, but he cannot take an article off the free list and put it on the dutiable list or take an article off the dutiable list and put it on the free list. Under this bill the President cannot impose any tax, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. BECK. But I do not know it. After all, we are simply disputing about terms. I say that when the President increases a tax by 50 percent he has imposed a tax, at least to that extent.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the gentleman cannot discriminate between imposing a tax and increasing or decreasing an existing tax, of course, we can never get together.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I simply wanted to know what the gentleman's opinion was as to the maximum and minimum rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. BECK. I would have to look at the act, as I do not recollect them.

These changes in our form of government, whereby the Executive Office is immensely expanded and the powers of Congress, as the great council of the Republic, are sensibly diminished, give me great concern. They are the results of a subtle change in our Government, which has been in progress in the last 50 years and which has been immeasurably accelerated in the last 12 months.

In 1887, three years after I was admitted to the historic bar of Philadelphia, that city held a great celebration, and with its characteristic hospitality was the host of the Nation. It was the centennial celebration of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

For a whole week Philadelphia was en fete.

September 17, 1887, is an imperishable memory with me. On that day many thousands gathered in front of Independence Hall to celebrate the exact hundredth anniversary of that day in Philadelphia when the weary members of the convention, having exhausted the possibilities of compromise, reluctantly signed their names to the great document and submitted it to the people for their decision.

President Cleveland, ex-President Hayes, and all the members of the Supreme Court were present, together with many Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and other able dignitaries, prelates, educators, and publicists from all parts of the country. President Cleveland delivered a memorable address, and then Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, delivered the formal oration.

I have recently glanced through the two ponderous volumes edited by Hampton L. Carson, of the proceedings of that notable celebration, which lasted for the greater part of a week. That which greatly impressed me was the fact that there was then nothing but the most unbounded optimism, not merely as to the surpassing merit of the Constitution, which seemed to them a flawless masterpiece, but also as to its assured permanence. Mr. Gladstone's oft-quoted tribute on that occasion was the verdict of all there present, and all seemingly felt that the troubles of the Constitution had now been happily adjusted, that the pendulum that had at first swung to a rigid construction and later to a liberal construction, had now reached the point of stabilization, and that in the future there was nothing for the Constitution except smooth seas and cloudless skies.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote a poem whose refrain was—

While the stars of heaven shall burn,
While the ocean tides return,
Ever may the circling sun
Find the Many still are One!

And this proud, but somewhat magniloquent boast was echoed in a new national hymn, written by F. Marion Crawford, whose refrain, chanted by a thousand voices, of which I was one, was—

Thy sun is risen, and shall not set
Upon thy day divine!
Ages of unborn ages yet,
America, are thine!

Few there present ever dreamed that the power of taxation—the most potentially destructive of all powers—would one day be vested to a large extent in the Executive.

Two minor notes alone were then sounded. At the banquet given to the Supreme Court of the United States by the bar of Philadelphia, the chief justice of Pennsylvania, addressing himself to the Chief Justice of the United States, appealed to the latter to preserve, by judicial decision, the boundary which the Constitution had prescribed between the powers of the Federal Government and those of the States. He said:

Mr. Chief Justice, you and your distinguished colleagues, with whose company we are honored today, have it in your power to do very much toward preserving intact the line of distinction between the Federal and State courts as marked out and defined by our fathers. You are the conservative element of the Government. The lofty tableland upon which you stand is far above the atmosphere engendered by politics. The waves of popular clamor break harmlessly at your feet. The Supreme Court of the United States is the central sun of our judicial system. Your permanent position and conservative surroundings eminently fit you to preserve the nice distinctions of the Constitution. There has never been, and I trust there never will be, a serious conflict between the Federal and the State courts. It can best be prevented in the future by preserving the line that has always existed between them, and by rendering unto Caesar the things only which belong to Caesar.

In this appeal to Chief Justice Waite, the chief justice of Pennsylvania was evidently under the illusion that the Supreme Court of the United States could effectually preserve the Constitution of the United States in a Nation which was essentially democratic in spirit.

I think the two great illusions of American history are the rooted ideas that the Constitution with its nicely prescribed boundaries of power could long limit the vagaries of democracy, and that the Supreme Court could effectively keep the American people within these prescribed boundaries of power. Nearly 2,000 years ago Aristotle had taught us that if a constitution conflicts with the ethos or genius of the people, it is the constitution that is broken in the conflict, and no better illustration can be given of this truth of the great Greek philosopher than the fate of the eighteenth amendment.

It is no less an illusion to suppose that the nine Justices of the Supreme Court can enforce the Constitution. In this period of rapid change, one can say of this august tribunal, in the words of Omar Khayyam:

Lift not thy hands to it for help—for it
Rolls impotently on as thou or I.

The reason for this is obvious. The Supreme Court cannot even interpret the Constitution unless there comes before it a litigated case, and many unconstitutional laws are passed by Congress which never give rise to a litigated case.

In the second place, there are many questions of interpretation which involve questions of a political or nonjusticiable character.

In the third place, the powers of the Federal Government are given for specific purposes and cannot, theoretically, be used for any other purpose; but if Congress uses such a power to accomplish an end that is within the reserved powers of the States, how can the Supreme Court determine the motives which prompted the legislation? That Court has not yet finally answered that question.

Apart from these three main considerations, the Supreme Court is not, and never was, a wholly independent body. It does not remain proudly in its seat of justice, as did the old senators of Rome, when the Goths and Vandals invaded the Imperial City. The Court is a very human institution; and while it is not true, as Mr. Dooley suggested, that it "follows the election returns", yet it cannot be indifferent to the deep currents of social changes, nor can it even be wholly deaf to the rumblings of popular discontent.

Undoubtedly the Court has done much to preserve the Federal Government from attempts of the States to invade the Federal sphere of power, but it has been largely ineffective in defending the States from the encroachments of the Federal Government. The proof of what I say, which may seem to many of you heretical, is the fact that while Congress, from the beginning, has passed thousands of laws for which it had no perceptible grant of power, the Supreme Court has only invalidated about 50 Federal statutes in all its history.

Recurring again to the constitutional celebration of 1887, at a dinner given by the learned societies of Philadelphia to the distinguished guests of the city, a more pointed speech was made by Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts. He, alone, pointedly warned those assembled that the centripetal influences of a mechanical civilization were fast destroying the constitutional equilibrium of our dual Government, and he added:

From the very beginning there have been two views of the Constitution—the liberal view and the strict view. In the first Cabinet of Washington, Hamilton represented one side of the great debate, which has gone on from that day to this, and Jefferson the other. Both parties to this debate have, I submit, been for a part of the time right; both have been for a part of the time wrong. The unexpected occurred—steam and electricity have in these days converted each thoughtful Hamiltonian into a believer in the construction theories of Jefferson; while, none the less, events have at the same time conclusively shown that in his own day Jefferson was wrong and Hamilton was right. * * * It is from the other side of the circle that danger is now to be anticipated; everything today centralizes itself; gravitation is the law. The centripetal force, unaided by government, working only through scientific sinews and nerves of steel and steam and lightning—this centripetal force is daily overcoming all centrifugal action. The ultimate result can be by thoughtful men no longer be ignored. Jefferson is right, and Hamilton is wrong.

As we look back upon that celebration in a cloudy vista of 47 years, it is clear that only Charles Francis Adams showed any clear foresight as to the future. This is not said by way of reflection, for the greatest political thinker of the nineteenth century, Prince Bismarck, once said that the wisest statesman could not see five years in advance, and on another occasion he said that no statesman can ever tell what cards Fate holds in its hands.

This is strikingly shown by the celebration to which I am referring. Its indiscriminating optimism showed no appreciation of the fact that the Constitution in 1887 was about to enter into a phase of development which would convert within a half century our federation of States into a unitary socialistic State.

The ancient boundaries of power were soon to be obliterated and the basic ideals of the framers of the Constitution were, less than a half century later, to be flouted as obsolete. In its practical operations government is more concerned with trade and industry than with any other phase of life, and it is noteworthy that when the centennial celebration took place in 1887, Congress for a century had never attempted to exercise affirmatively any power over interstate commerce by regulating statutes. The operations of the commerce clause were restrictive upon State legislation and purely negative.

The number of cases which arose under the commerce clause up to 1860 were only 20. Thirty years later there were 148, and since then the number has been so multiplied that most constitutional cases today arise either under the commerce clause or under the fifth or fourteenth amendments.

The beginning of the new era was the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission on February 4, 1887. There were not wanting those who clearly foresaw the bureaucratic Frankenstein that Congress was about to create. For example, Senator Morgan, of Alabama, said:

I admit all that has been said about the wrongs and injustice that people have suffered through the overbearing insolence and oppression of the railroad companies. Their greed is destructive to the people and the governments from whom they derived their powers; but in finding a remedy for this evil I neither wish to find for the people a new master, remote from them and their influence, in the Congress of the United States, nor to place in the hands of that master a power over their trade and traffic more dangerous than the power of the railroad companies.

A few years after the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission came the Department of Agriculture, and 3 years later came the passage of the Sherman antitrust law, and these three laws were only the prelude to a continuing policy of bureaucratic regulation under which the Federal Government assumed control over the farm and factory and even the life of the individual.

The mighty changes in our constitutional system which have taken place in the last half century have been effected principally in three ways.

The first has been the perversion of Federal powers to destroy the reserved rights of the States. This has been largely accomplished through the taxing power and the power over commerce.

The second and more destructive method has been the abuse of the power of appropriation, and this has proved the most vulnerable tendon of our Achilles.

From the beginning the Government, the Congress, from time to time, made appropriations for purposes that were not within the Federal field of power, but in most instances they were justified as purely philanthropic and humanitarian gifts. In the last half century our Federal bureaucracy has grown by leaps and bounds because Congress has realized that in appropriating money for non-Federal purposes they could assume an incidental right to supervise the uses of the money, and thus the Federal Government immensely expanded its operations. For example, the Department of Agriculture can have no constitutional justification except insofar as interstate or foreign conveyance of agricultural commodities are concerned, but this stupendous Department, which now spends far more money each year than the whole Federal Government spent in 1887, supervises the conditions of the farm and the methods of production to such an extent that even the intimate personal life of the farmer is sought to be influenced by its Bureau of Home Economics.

In recent years a third and more alarming doctrine has been introduced as a justification for Federal usurpation, and that is the doctrine of emergency. It was long ago said by Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion in the Legal Tender cases:

What was in 1862 called the "medicine of the Constitution" has now become its daily bread. So it always happens that whenever a wrong principle of conduct, political or personal, is adopted on the plea of necessity, it will be afterwards followed on a plea of convenience. . . . From the decision of the Court I see only evil likely to follow.

What he said seems especially applicable to the present doctrine of emergency. This doctrine was once characterized by the Supreme Court in the case of Ex parte Milligan as easily the most pernicious of constitutional heresies, but it now threatens to be so firmly embedded in our form of government that unless this Nation returns to the beaten tracks of the Fathers, which at the moment seems improbable, it is within the power of the President, not merely to declare an emergency, but to create one, and having done so, to overturn our form of government by claiming for the Federal Government all power deemed by the President to be essential to end the emergency. This is not a prophecy; it is a present fact.

It may yet prove to be the beginning of the end of our form of constitutional government, and this has come within 47 years after the American people in 1887 celebrated the adoption of the great compact with such generous acclaim and unbounded optimism, and largely in the space of a short 12 months. If so, we no longer have except in form a written Constitution, and we now realize the pointed warning that Chief Justice Fuller gave in his great dissenting opinion in the Lottery Case, "It is with governments as with religions, the form often survives the substance of the faith."

What now is beginning to concern the thoughtful American is the future of that Constitution. Freely conceding that it never was and never could be rigid and inelastic, is it to grow in wisdom or perish in folly? Are we today rising to greater heights of constitutionalism, or are we descending into that Avernus of destruction from which escape to the upper air is so difficult?

We are passing through an economic crisis of exceptional gravity. It is not the worst economic crisis that our Republic has experienced. Indeed, the economic crisis which prevailed at the time the Constitution was formulated was far graver than the present one, for at that time the credit of the American Commonwealth had fallen so low that men derisively papered their houses with the worthless continental currency, and the bonds of the infant Republic sold at 4 cents on the dollar. And yet these nation builders formulated the most conservative form of government in the world.

It is not the gravity of the crisis which should give us concern as to the future of the Constitution but rather the present spirit of too many Americans.

The Constitution was based upon an individualistic state of society, and it has required considerable adaptation to make it work for what is now a collectivistic state. To this I assign the fact, which seems to me indubitable, that the Constitution for the last 50 years has been in process of slow demolition. Here an arch has fallen, there a pillar, and now it is the foundations themselves that are fast sinking, and if the present process of destruction proceeds, it is not unlikely that within the life of the present generation the whole structure will fall into cureless ruin.

What is more significant is that the process of demolition is proceeding with accelerating speed. At first it was so sporadic and insidious that it was hardly noticed. A decade might elapse before another arch would fall, but as we view the momentous changes in the Constitution in the last twelve months, due to practical administration, judicial interpretation, and abdication by Congress of its powers and duties, the thoughtful man is beginning to appreciate that our form of government is not unlike the present ruins of the coliseum, and the best that one can hope is that "while stands the coliseum" (the Constitution) even in its ruins, Rome (by which I mean the Union) will stand.

It is a proof of Washington's extraordinary sagacity that in his farewell address he predicted that our form of government would not be overthrown from without but undermined from within; and if we divest our minds of illusions and face grim realities it can hardly be questioned that the Constitution in many of its basic features has been undermined. The warning of Charles Francis Adams has been fully justified by events.

I have no doubt that if the Constitution were submitted tomorrow to the American people for readoption or rejection that the American people, by an overwhelming majority, would readopt it. But this would not be because of any knowledge of its text or its fundamental philosophy, but only because of respect for a historic landmark and a subconscious belief in the average man that it is the Constitution that in some way holds together a people who inhabit a vast continent and number over 120,000,000. To them the Constitution is the organic expression of the Union. The Union means the unity of the American people; and the Union, it being the oldest name of the American Commonwealth, is very dear to all Americans. They realize that the Constitution means a political and economic unity for one of the most powerful races that the world has ever known and that as such it confers upon him as an American citizen a powerful prestige and immeasurable benefits, such as no other nation at the present time can afford its citizens.

While, therefore, the Constitution would be readopted by an overwhelming vote as an entirety, and to a certain extent as an abstraction, yet this is not inconsistent with the fact that when the Constitution is attacked in detail by measures which are foreign to its nature and destructive of its purposes, the American people can only see the ponderables of the question and are quite satisfied that the Constitution in detail should be undermined, to use Washington's phrase, if it means an immediate advantage to the people.

Washington was so concerned as to the possibility of this spirit of pragmatism that he predicted, in a letter written to his friend and comrade in arms, Lafayette, shortly after the formation of the Constitution, that it would last—

So long as there shall remain any virtue in the body of the people.

He then continued:

I would not be misunderstood, my dear Marquis, to speak of consequences, which may be produced in the revolution of ages by corruption of morals, profligacy of manners, or listlessness in the preservation of the natural and unalienable rights of mankind, nor of the successful usurpations that may be established at such an unpropitious juncture upon the ruins of liberty, however providently guarded and secured, as these are contingencies against which no human prudence can effectually provide.

Notwithstanding his eloquent reference to the rising sun, Franklin had the same gripping fear when he urged the members of the Convention to sign the Constitution. He said:

There is no form of government but what may be a blessing to the people if well administered, and I believe, further, that this Constitution is likely to be well administered for a course of years, and can only end in despotism as other forms have done before it, when the people shall become so corrupted as to need despotic government, being incapable of any other.

I draw your especial attention to the words of Washington, already quoted, when he warned that the destruction of the Constitution would result from listlessness in the preservation of the natural and inalienable rights of mankind, for he was there distinguishing between the ponderables of the problem, in whose pragmatic advantages the people chiefly feel concerned, and those great imponderables of liberty which are not for one age but for all time, and without which no nation can be truly free, whatever its nominal form of government is. He emphasized this in his poignantly pathetic farewell address when he said:

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretenses. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown.

Washington and Franklin were only thus expressing the opinions of all the master builders of 1787, that no constitution is self-executing and none can preserve itself no matter what its governmental machinery may be. They recognized better than we do that in the last analysis the preservation of the Constitution would depend upon the will of the American people, and that it was futile to expect that the people would defend what they had created unless the average citizen was inspired by what Grote well called "constitutional morality", which means a knowledge of the Constitution, a loyal acceptance of its spirit, and a militant purpose to defend it from destruction. If this be wanting, and there has been little evidence in recent months that the American people have this spirit of constitutional morality, then the preservation of the Constitution is an impossible task, for slowly its basic principles will yield to the spirit of opportunism.

The American people once had this spirit of constitutional morality in a very high degree. It was this spirit that led them to fight for seven weary years to vindicate a principle of taxation, although the nature of the tax was only a "tupenny" duty on a pound of tea. To them the amount of the tax or its economic effect was unimportant. It was the great imponderable as to whether the taxing power could be exercised by a Parliament 3,000 miles away and in which the American people had no representation. The sufferings of Valley Forge were endured for a sacred principle. When the Constitution was submitted to the people, it was debated throughout the Union at every crossroads and in every farmhouse; and the questions that were discussed were not the pragmatic advantages of the proposed new form of government, but rather the question whether the liberties of the individual were adequately protected.

I have recently had occasion to read William Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, and I read such portions of Henry's argument against the Constitution as were made in the Virginia Convention, and I was immensely impressed, not only with the force of his eloquence but with his vision as to what would be evolved by construction from the naked text of the Constitution.

While the American people accepted the Constitution with great hesitation, yet, when its advantages became manifest in the rise of a new nation in the firmament of history, the people began to believe passionately in the Constitution; and from 1789 to 1861 the debates on constitutional questions were the greatest that ever took place in America, and were equal to the greatest debates that ever took place on a form of government in the annals of history.

Here again in these debates the pragmatic advantages of any proposed legislation were wholly subordinated to the question whether a proposed measure was within the grant of power, and while there speedily developed the two schools of thought as to the construction of the document, one advocating strictness and the other liberality, yet both believed in their Constitution, and without respect to economic advantages they fought for the underlying principles of government that seemed to them at stake. When James Monroe attacked the constitutionality of internal improvements he was not thinking whether Virginia would get a road at the expense of the Federal Treasury, but whether the Constitution had granted any such power of appropriation.

It was the tenacious adherence to the Constitution which led in the early days of the Republic to the great crisis, which nearly disrupted the Union. The greatest debate in our history, and I am inclined to think in the annals of the English-speaking race, was the debate a century ago on Senator Foote's resolution, innocent in itself, but which developed the whole question as to what the rights of the States were if the Federal Government deliberately and indubitably usurped a power that was not granted to it. If Webster's reply to Hayne was the greatest forensic effort in our history, the speech of Hayne, of South Carolina, was not unworthy of the reply, for these were only two of the gladiators, for there were many arguments of remarkable power and eloquence made a century ago on both sides of the question, which are only now forgotten because they were overshadowed by Webster's masterful effort.

After the Civil War an entirely new spirit came to the American people. It was as though our written Constitution had become an unwritten one. Thenceforth, except on rare occasions, there was little more than lip service paid to the Constitution, although in that Civil War hundreds of thousands had died to preserve it. Acts that were flagrantly unconstitutional were passed on the theory that Congress had no responsibility, as the final decision rested with the Supreme Court. This quite ignored the fact that the question might never arise in the Supreme Court and that if it did the Supreme Court, necessarily influenced in a democracy by the will of the people, would hesitate a long time before disregarding the fiat of Congress. In this spirit the boundaries of Federal power were pushed forward with amazing speed and those of the States correspondingly contracted. Undoubtedly this was due in large part to the impact of a mechanical civilization and it may have been inevitable, but it put upon the Supreme Court the impossible strain, when a case did arise, of trying to reconcile the will of Congress—which no longer takes into account its limited powers under the Constitution—with the provisions of that document.

With a subtlety worthy of medieval scholasticism and reminding me, as I recently had occasion to say in this House, of Swift's Tale of a Tub, the Court proceeded to reconcile the acts of Congress with an extraordinarily latitudinarian interpretation of the Constitution.

The probable passage of the legislation now proposed and under discussion shows how insidiously our Constitution can be changed and its basic principles overthrown.

The Constitution was formed under the traditions of the English revolution of 1689. That meant the supremacy of the people in Parliament, and it was fundamental in that theory of government that the executive should never have a power to impose a tax, but that such levies upon the wealth of the people should only be authorized by the composite judgment of their representatives in Parliament. In defense of that principle Hampden risked his life, Charles I lost his head, and James II his crown. For that principle our forebears in England had struggled from the dawn of constitutional liberty and they had maintained from the times of the Plantagenet kings to the present day that any tax measure must originate in the will of the people.

Therefore, our Constitution provided that the House of Representatives should originate all tax bills and that Congress alone should impose taxes. No more sacred duty was imposed upon it, for it was never intended that any levy should be made upon the American people unless by the consent of their Representatives in Congress. Congress has already surrendered its taxing power for, in the present emergency statute, the Secretary of Agriculture was given absolute power to impose taxes upon the processors of agricultural commodities in his discretion. And what is worse, it gave him the power to turn over the proceeds of the levy to one class in the community.

To this end the Secretary can even impose a tariff duty upon imports whenever he thinks it necessary to protect the processors, whose cost of production is necessarily raised by the processing tax. You will thus see that the complete power of taxation in the manner indicated has been vested in the head of a department to do whatever he pleases. Now it is proposed to vest in the President the power of taxation on imports. Thus we have a perversion not merely of the Constitution but of a basic principle of Anglo-Saxon liberty, for which the American people and their forebears have fought for over 500 years, and which they thought they had written into the Constitution in a manner that could not be defeated.

I could give many other examples of this slow undermining of our Government, either by laws upon which the Supreme Court never has occasion to pass, or by laws which, when passed, are sustained by the Supreme Court in deference to the will of Congress.

Possibly my pessimism is due to my advancing years, for the shadows of life are fast lengthening with me and I cannot hope to see the future development of the Constitution, as I have witnessed it in the last half century.

We are fundamentally a democracy; and while a constitution can retard the spirit of innovation, it can never wholly defeat it. It can be a rudder or a chart, but never an anchor.

Today many Americans seemingly favor a central government of unlimited powers. Whether such a government would insure the perpetuity of the Union is a serious question. The founders of the Republic believed that no central government of unlimited powers could be successful, and in this they were fully justified by the consistent experience of history. A unitary and homogeneous State, like England or France, may be able to distribute the blessings of government without creating sectional or class antagonism, but if the federated British Commonwealth of Nations were to make such an attempt as that of the processing tax, and the wealth of Canada were drained to support the farmers of Australia, the Empire would dissolve overnight. The fear of a like fate dominated the thoughts of the great Convention of 1787. They recognized that there was an inevitable conflict of economic interests between the different sections of America, and that the only way to prevent a dissolution of the Union by reason of such conflict was to confine the Federal Government to a very limited sphere of power.

Even as so limited, our Nation was twice brought to the verge of destruction by a clash of economic interests, and it has only been preserved by the welding influences of steam and electricity and general and ever-increasing prosperity.

Today, however, the Federal Government, asserting unlimited power and concentrating it in the President, is attempting to redistribute property to draining the wealth of the industrial States for the benefit of the agricultural States. The present depression may make the industrial States conscious of this continuous drain on their resources, and the ever-smoldering fire of sectionalism may again break out into a destructive blaze. Should the Union disintegrate, some future Gibbon will say that its downfall began when the Nation disregarded the wise limitations of the Constitution on Federal power, and began to assert the unlimited power of a unitary State.

I am loath to end my speech upon so pessimistic a note. Who can say what is in the womb of the future? In this hour of acute anxiety we can well recall the noble words of Franklin, uttered when the great crisis of the Convention arose and when its success seemed impossible. He said:

I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth: That God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings, that "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." I firmly believe this, and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel. We shall be divided by our little partial local interests, our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a byword down to future ages. And what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing governments by human wisdom and leave it to chance, war, and conquest.

Will this be the fate of America? I am by no means hopeless. All human progress in government is marked by alternate periods of integration and disintegration. When the integration proceeds too far, the pendulum swings back and reaches the other extreme of disintegration, only to swing back when the distribution of power has gone too far.

Moreover, there is one great fact of which the proponents of the new deal are seemingly ignorant. It is the native individualism of the American. The old pioneer spirit has not wholly lost its force, even in a mechanical civilization.

The fate of the eighteenth amendment clearly proved that, and I today see signs of a distinct reaction in the hearts of the people against this attempt to make one man, even though he be President, the master of the destinies of the American people.

No one man, whoever he may be, is fit to play such a role. Dictators have never long lasted. In a homogeneous nation a dictatorship may last for a time, for the problem is not so complex as with a heterogeneous nation of conflicting interests. The present dictators in Italy may last as long as Mussolini lives, for he is a man of extraordinary ability and may rank high in history as one of the greatest sons of Italy—that fertile mother of great men—but when Mussolini dies, what will then happen in the struggle to seize the scepter that will then fall from his hands? As for the dictatorship in Germany, it is doomed to failure long before Hitler shall live his allotted span of life, for that narrow fanatic is not a Mussolini.

Where, however, a people is heterogeneous and occupies, as our Nation does, a vast territorial domain ranging from the sub-Arctic to the Tropics, and with all the conflicting economic interests that differences in climate necessarily bring about, then a dictator cannot long last, for he cannot so dispense governmental favors as to placate all sections, classes, and interests.

Moreover, the old love of liberty is not dead in America. It may for a moment be moribund because of the prostrating effect upon the human spirit of a prolonged depression, but sooner or later—and I believe at no distant day—the American people will turn back to the beaten paths of the fathers and will again be animated by the spirit of liberty, which influenced Washington and Franklin, Hamilton and Jefferson.

The American Constitution did not believe in one-man power, and for a very obvious reason that is inherent in human nature. A President, whoever he may be, cannot wholly arise above the conditions of his birth and of his environment. He carries with him into his high office all the influences of his early surroundings. It was for this reason that the framers of the Constitution refused to concentrate power in one man. It vested all legislative power in a Congress, which would represent the composite will of the entire people, and they never intended that the representatives of the people should abdicate their responsible office and transfer the legislative power to the President. Undoubtedly Congress, like all parliamentary institutions, is by reason of its being thus representative of the thereby be a matter of slow compromise; but if we must thereby be a matter of slow compromise, but if we must choose between the security of liberty and the supposed efficiency of one-man power, the genius of our institutions prefers the former.

I remember a passage in Victor Hugo's masterpiece where, in a political club, an orator in glowing terms described the genius of Napoleon, but when he ended his eloquent tribute to the achievements of one of the greatest of the children of men by asking what could be better, a fellow member answered him in three words. They were "To be free."

The American people are not yet so demoralized that they prefer so-called "efficiency" to their liberty. Unless I gravely mistake the present state of the public mind, they are already in revolt against the great betrayal of our form of government which we have witnessed in the last 12 months.

The shallows murmur, but the deep is dumb.

The little coterie of socialistic visionaries, called the "brain trust", and who apparently influence the President, are the shallows which are now very vocal. But the American people represent the unfathomable deep, which though silent at the moment will yet become articulate. They are already becoming so, and I venture now to predict that when the American people again go to the polls to select a President they will, by an overwhelming majority, composed of the good men of all parties, sweep away this attempt to vest the mighty power of the American people in one man. If I did not think this, I would despair of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGugin].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, we hear that it is necessary that the President have the power to negotiate foreign trade agreements, owing to the fact that other countries negotiate agreements very quickly.

This must be remembered, that other countries which negotiate trade agreements are countries that do not operate under a written constitution. This country operates under a written Constitution, and, say what you please, this bill does violate at least four provisions of the Constitution.

The first is the provision that all revenue legislation shall originate in the House. Another is that Congress shall levy taxes. Another, Congress shall regulate commerce between the countries and between the States; and whatever may be said, this bill is regulating commerce with foreign countries, which Congress alone has the power to do. If a treaty is negotiated, it has to be approved by two thirds of the Members of the Senate. This is not a mere academic question. Only 3 years ago a prominent Democrat took the position that it was an irreparable error for Congress to transfer to the President a much milder control over tariff rates.

Let me read you some remarks by Secretary of State Cordell Hull when he was a Member of the House of Representatives. You will find it in volume 71, part 2, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session of the Seventy-first Congress.

Mr. Hull said:

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

Such were the views of Cordell Hull 3 years ago when a Member of the House. Today he is asking Congress to yield a much greater power. I join with him in his statement of 3 years ago that it is "too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

In this connection I wish to extend my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by inserting quotations from various Members of Congress at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MR. GARNER

Mr. McGUGIN. From a speech by Vice President Garner when he was a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas and the leader of the Democratic Party in the House, page 1080, volume 71, part 1, first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes.

Remember this, gentlemen: When the legislative body surrenders its tariff power and its obligations to the Executive—under our system of government a majority can do that, but you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and the Senate.

Remember that when you surrender this power of taxation you surrender it for all time to come or until the two bodies, by a two-thirds vote, can take it away from the Executive.

If an ambitious man is in the White House, he will not surrender it. If a wise and patriotic man is in the White House, he may have a want of confidence in the Congress, so neither of them would be willing to give up the power.

MR. DOUGHTON

From speech of Mr. DOUGHTON, present Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1474, volume 71, first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

The Fathers who framed the Constitution, wisely, in my opinion, left to Congress the initiating and enacting of laws raising revenue. The flexible provision giving the President the power to raise or lower tariff rates to the amount of 50 percent renders nugatory in spirit and practical effect this provision of the Constitution. If the President is given the power to raise and lower rates 50 percent, he should be given the full responsibility for the making of all rates.

This provision, together with the one providing for the matter of appraisal to be finally lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury, will make the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and certain bureau chiefs not only sole arbiters in all tariff matters but in deed and reality they will be sole dictators, and Congress and the customs courts, as far as tariff matters are concerned, might just as well be abolished.

MR. CRISP

From speech of Mr. Crisp, the former distinguished Democratic Member from the State of Georgia, while a member of the Ways and Means Committee, page 1349, volume 71, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

Gentlemen, think what a potential power the power to make tariff rates would be in an election year, to let the President of the United States have the right to write a tariff bill! Stop and think about it. Do you think there would be any dearth of campaign contributions?

O gentlemen, you are surrendering your right under the Constitution. Our forefathers fought for that right—the right that the elected Members of the people, the Representatives of the people, should alone have to levy taxes against them. [Applause.] And here you are surrendering it; and when you have surrendered it, do not expect that you will get it back soon. If you should surrender this power and should pass a law to repeal it, the President could veto it, and it would take a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress to override that veto, and it is seldom that either of the two great political parties in our country has a two-thirds vote in both branches of Congress.

O gentlemen, do not let the political exigencies of this case induce you to permit another entering wedge into the shrine of the Government as outlined by our forefathers, under which this Nation has grown and prospered until today it is the most powerful, the wealthiest, and most highly respected Nation on earth. [Applause.]

MR. STEAGALL

Speech by the Honorable HENRY STEAGALL, distinguished Democratic Member of this House and Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, page 2007, volume '71, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

Mr. Chairman, when this Congress meets, it is just as if every man, woman, and child under the flag that we honor had assembled here. It is the American people in their sovereign capacity who are assembled here now. We speak for them. If we fail in our duty from any cause or surrender our rights, it is a blow at free government. Yet we are taking orders like bootblacks. Such a procedure is calculated to reduce the voice of the average Member of this body to where he amounts to no more than a taxi driver in the city of Washington, as far as power and authority in the control of legislation is concerned. For one, I enter my protest. It involves a surrender of the people's rights, which should not be tolerated.

MR. GREENWOOD

Speech of Mr. Greenwood, former distinguished Democratic Member of the House, on page 1648, volume '71, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

The so-called "flexible clause" delegates to the President of the United States the power to raise or lower rates.

This is delegating the legislative powers of Congress with respect to the taxing power of the Federal Government.

I am in favor of keeping the three departments separate and inviolate. I think it is better for the rights of the people for Congress to act in matters of legislation rather than delegating that power to the President. [Applause.]

Yea votes voting against the flexible provision: Bankhead, Buchanan, Byrns, Cochran of Missouri, Crisp, Douglas of Arizona, Garner, Hill of Washington, Hull of Tennessee, McCormack of Massachusetts, McDuffie, O'Connor of New York, Pou, Henry T. Rainey, Steagall, Vinson of Georgia.

The foregoing are some of the distinguished Democratic Members who voted for a motion to recommit, which motion was offered by Mr. Garner, and would have destroyed the present provisions providing for the powers of the President in changing tariff rates after findings of fact by the Tariff Commission. The opposition to placing this power in the hands of the President was based upon the claim that it was transferring too much power from the Congress to the President over the making of tariff rates. This was the principal reason given why these Members, together with other Members, voted for this motion to recommit. Today these same Members are advocating giving over to the President the power to make changes in the tariff rates without any findings of fact from the Tariff Commission. The power now being surrendered by Congress and given to the President is infinitely more power than that which was given in the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill; yet these gentlemen protested against the power in the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill because they thought that it was placing too much power in the hands of the President.

Assuming that owing to the ability of foreign countries to make tariff changes quickly that the United States in self-defense must be able to do likewise, there is still no occasion for giving this unlimited power to the President. In giving the President power to negotiate trade agreements we should at least insert the provision that such trade agreements shall go into effect immediately and remain effective unless within 60 legislative days after the execution of such trade agreements the House or the Senate shall by a majority vote decide against any specific trade agreement so executed by the President. If we are to have any regard whatever for the Constitution or for the rights of the people, then the people through their chosen representatives must at least have some opportunity to check any trade agreement which the people regard as adverse to their interests.

Yielding the constitutional power which is vested in the Congress of the United States to the President of the United States is far more than an academic question. It is something which has not worked out successfully.

When we delegate powers to the President on the assumption that the President will carry them out, in actual fact they are carried out by some subordinates in the departments, and when they have carried them out they are not in accord with the statements of the President at the time he asked for the legislation.

The truth is, things are being done in the departments by men who were not elected by any constituency in America. Underlings and subordinates down in the departments are carrying out these matters because Congress has delegated the power to the President.

There are men in these departments whose conduct is not in keeping with the traditional Americanism. That challenge was hurled to the country yesterday before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when a letter was read from Dr. Wirt, who quotes some member of the "brain trust" as having said:

We are on the inside. We control the avenues of influence. We can make the President believe that he is making decisions for himself.

We believe that we have Mr. Roosevelt in the middle of a swift stream, and that the current is so strong that he cannot turn back or escape from it. We believe that we can keep Mr. Roosevelt there until we are ready to supplant him with a Stalin. We think that Mr. Roosevelt is only the Kerensky of this revolution.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I should like to know the authority of that. Who is responsible for that statement? Who is that mysterious member of the "brain trust"?

Mr. MCGUGIN. If the gentleman will keep quiet, that is what I am coming to. That is a strong statement. It has come to the attention of a committee of this House and I say that the obligation is on that committee to bring Dr. Wirt before that committee and, under oath, make him tell who the man is that made that statement.

The President of the United States, the Congress, and the people of this country have a right to know whether Dr. Wirt told the truth when he quoted someone as having said that, and the country has a right to know who the man is connected with the "brain trust" that said it, if there is any such man. The time has come for a show-down on that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGUGIN. I cannot yield. Aside from this I can point out to you some strong circumstances that men are running this Government contrary to the former expressed statements of the President, and contrary to the belief of Congress when Congress conveyed certain authority to the President. I refer to the broad powers we extended in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

When we enacted the Agricultural Act Congress acted in good faith upon the message that the President sent to the Congress. Congress acted in good faith upon the pre-election speech of the President, but when the bill is taken to the Agricultural Department and is being administered, we find that it is not administered in keeping with the former statements of the President of the United States. Let me quote to you what President Roosevelt said in his pre-election speech at Topeka, Kans., wherein Mr. Roosevelt referred to President Hoover and his Farm Board:

When the futility of maintaining prices of wheat and cotton through so-called "stabilization" became apparent the President's Farm Board, of which his Secretary of Agriculture was a member, invented the cruel joke of advising farmers to allow 20 percent of their wheat lands to lie idle, to plow up every third row of cotton, and to shoot every tenth dairy cow. Surely they knew that his advice would not, indeed, could not be taken. It was probably offered as the foundation of an alibi. They wanted to be able to say to the farmers, "You did not do as we told you to do. Blame yourselves."

Such were the statements of Mr. Roosevelt before the election, in his speech at Topeka on September 29, 1932. Such were his ideas pertaining to the farm program. Yet when we enacted legislation giving him power to administer that act he did what he had to do, he turned it over to the Agricultural Department. Then, when the Agricultural Department, under Professor Tugwell, administers that act, it pays no more attention to the expressed views of the President than it does to the expressed views of a newsboy on the street. So, what actually happens when Congress delegates its authority to the President is that the President does not carry it out, but some underlings down in the departments carry it out. When we enact this bill and convey to the President the authority to single out the particular industries which will be beheaded in this country as uneconomic he will not make the decisions, but underlings in these departments will make them, just as they are making them down in the Agricultural Department now. But that is not all.

Let me give you another illustration of how the Agriculture Department, in administering the Agricultural Adjustment Act, is betraying and repudiating every principle the President has ever uttered. The President, in his Topeka speech further said, speaking of his proposed farm plan:

The plan must not be coercive; it must be voluntary, and the individual producer at all times shall have the opportunity of nonparticipation if he so desires.

Yet one week ago today Member after Member stood on this floor and said that the voluntary allotments with respect to cotton had failed, and that we have to have a compulsory bill, and so the House passed the confiscatory cotton tax Bankhead bill.

The President in his message to Congress, when he asked for the adjustment act, said:

If a fair administrative trial of it is made and it does not produce the hoped-for results, I shall be the first to acknowledge it and advise you.

Now, when we find it has not produced the hoped-for results, does the Agricultural Department or anyone advise us that it has failed? No; they just simply say that now we must make it compulsory with the Bankhead bill.

The men who are actually administering that act in the Department of Agriculture under the domination of Mr. Tugwell have absolutely no regard for the views of President Roosevelt on the farm program as he has expressed them. Here is what the plan is and what Mr. Tugwell says the plan is:

For the first time the Government is thinking of the land as a whole. . . . For the first time we are preparing to build a land program which will control the use of that greatest of all natural resources not merely for the benefit of those who happen to hold title to it.

From Professor Tugwell's recent speech at Philadelphia.

In the light of the experience of what has happened in the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, it is clear that when this power is granted to the President, that in the administration of that power we shall find something entirely different from what we understand now are to be the accomplishments under this bill.

Such has been the situation under the agricultural act. Such were the regulations issued under the Economy Act. Without exception, when we have transferred congressional authority to the President, and when he turns it over to the subordinates to administer, they administer it to suit themselves and not at all in keeping with the expressed views of the President at the time he received the legislation. That is why it is dangerous for Congress to give this power away. Remember, if we be honest, when Congress passes this bill we are not in fact giving to President Roosevelt the power to do something. What we are doing is giving power to some "brain trusters" down in the Department of Agriculture and the Department of State to make trade agreements which no one in this House today believes will be made. That power is being taken away from Congress and given to men who are not in sympathy with the Republic under the Constitution, given to men who could not be elected to office by any constituency in the United States. Yet that is the danger involved in the policy of extending such authority.

In actual practice it is doubtful that we shall be able to open up farm markets. We are going to find that they will trade away American farm markets in the hope of finding some industrial markets abroad. Mr. Hull just came back from Argentina. What was the plan he brought back? Was it to sell more farm products? No. The suggestion was that if the Argentine would buy more American automobiles, America would buy more of Argentina's beef. The reason is obvious. If we make any trade agreements, they must be made in the Western Hemisphere, and we cannot find a country in the Western Hemisphere that will buy any of our farm products. They have farm products to sell. They will buy our manufactured products if we will buy their farm products.

If there were ever a political party in the history of this country which was simply talked and kidded out of power, it was the Republican Party as a result of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. From the enactment of that bill the Democratic press and Democratic orators vilified the bill from one end of this country to the other. They succeeded in making the majority of the American people believe that it was an iniquitous bill. Mr. Garner, Democratic leader in the House at the time of the enactment of the bill, bitterly criticized the bill, yet, thereafter, he was the Speaker of the House and in control of the House of Representatives. Under his leadership there was no effort made to change a single schedule in the bill. Mr. Collier criticized the bill at the time of its enactment and thereafter, he was Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee during an entire session of Congress. He did not undertake to change a single schedule in the bill. Mr. DOUGHTON criticized the bill at the time of its enactment. He has been chairman of the Ways and Means Committee during the special session of the Seventy-third Congress and thus far during this regular session of the Seventy-third Congress. He has never specified a single schedule in the bill which should be changed. Mr. RAINEY, at the time of the enactment of this bill, vilified the bill in all of its parts. He has been Speaker of the House during the special session and thus far during this regular session of the Seventy-third Congress. He has under his leadership something like 315 Democrats. He has never specified a single schedule in this bill which should be changed; yet, any day, he could take 215 Democratic Members and change every schedule in the bill.

I here insert some of the statements made pertaining to the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill by some prominent Democratic leaders at the time of the enactment of the bill:

MR. GARNER

Speech by Vice President Garner when he was a Democratic Representative from the State of Texas and leader of the Democratic Party in the House, page 1080, volume 71, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

This is what you have in this bill: First, you have surrendered your right for an indefinite period to raise or lower the rates, because there will be no occasion for another tariff bill until the American people rebel against the iniquity of what I believe to be the highest and most indefensible bill ever imposed upon the statute books. And you make the Secretary of the Treasury the absolute arbiter, and you have taken away from the courts the opportunity of the parties affected going into court and having them review the action of the Treasury Department.

MR. DOUGHTON

From a speech by Mr. DOUGHTON, present Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, page 1474, volume 71, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

When a Democrat refuses to give his support to this measure of abomination, so universally condemned, we are charged with being unwilling to give adequate protection to agriculture and other American industries.

MR. HILL

From a speech of Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, of Washington, a distinguished Democratic Member of this House and a member of the Ways and Means Committee, page 1632, volume 71, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

There is not a word in here that is for the benefit of the poor people, not a line in all your bill; but, on the other hand, every single schedule that you have operated on in that whole measure indicates that you are endeavoring to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. It is time now for somebody in authority to recognize that those who are actually supporting this Government should have decent consideration in legislation, instead of which you have brought out a bill to give the manufacturer the further right to reach into the pockets of the masses and take therefrom what they have labored to make. May God help you to go out and change this and make it an honest and a decent bill.

MR. COLLIER

Mr. Collier, former distinguished Democratic Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Mississippi and Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee during the Seventy-first Congress, had the following to say in part, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 71, page 1274, first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

Now, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Garner, was not protesting so much against the rates, though he thought they were sectional, as against the administrative features of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Hull, belong to another political school of thought and they were opposed to the general protective trend of the bill.

MR. COX

From speech of Mr. Cox, distinguished Democratic Member from the State of Georgia. Taken from page 1294, volume 71, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

So far as I am concerned, it does not matter which party writes the tariff legislation. My concern is that it be written right. The bill before us is not in my judgment what it ought to be. It is a poor apology toward the fulfillment of the promise that both major parties made the country in their platforms in the recent political contest.

MR. RAINEY

The following is taken from a speech by Speaker RAINEY delivered in the House of Representatives when he was a Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee. His speech begins on page 1143, volume 71, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Seventy-first Congress:

I have no doubt that the Republican Party could do worse than this, but up to the present time they have not done worse than this in the history of tariff legislation in this country and in every other country in the world. This bill is a monstrosity without a parallel, indefensible in nearly every paragraph.

When Democrats revise the tariff—and they occasionally have done it—the method of doing it has been different from the Republican method. I served on the Ways and Means Committee during the preparation of the Underwood tariff bill. We considered, first of all, the economic effects of the rates we fixed. We consider their effect on the revenue of the United States. We consider whether or not there is a difference in labor costs at home and abroad. We take all those things into consideration and listen to all the evidence we can get, including the evidence of experts, and then with that information we revise the tariff.

It will be noted from the speech of Speaker RAINEY delivered at the time the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was under consideration that he outlined the manner in which the Democratic Party enacted tariff bills. The Democratic procedure which he outlined at that time does not include giving blanket power to the President to make tariff changes. The procedure which he outlined provided for a constitutional enactment of tariff bills. Evidently between that time and this day, when Mr. RAINEY is Speaker of this House and in control of the House of Representatives, the Democratic Party has changed its procedure in the enactment of tariff bills. In fairness to the Democratic Party, a great and historic party, the program now suggested is not at all in keeping with the historical and traditional policies of the Democratic Party.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, in the spring of 1933 certain ominous outstanding facts pertaining to world trade were available to anyone interested. Briefly, they were that from 1929 to the spring of 1933 world commerce had decreased in value approximately 66 percent while the foreign commerce of the United States had decreased in value 75 percent. The United States was rapidly losing ground among the commercial nations of the world, particularly in the South American market, where our neighbors and best customers ought to be. Concurrently with this loss in world commerce the index of our domestic trade showed the greatest depreciation of any of the large countries. Complete statistics will probably show that it was in the neighborhood of 46 percent.

Concurrently also with this calamity it developed that the great commercial countries of the world were rapidly adopting a new method for the control of foreign commerce. They were no longer relying principally on tariff restrictions either to protect their own producers or to acquire a foreign market. They were adopting quotas, import licenses, exchange pools, embargos, and a number of other regulations.

France had applied the quota system to over one third of her imports. Switzerland to over one fourth, and other countries, such as Germany, Poland, and Holland, in different proportions. There were very few countries in the world of any importance that were not using the control of foreign exchange, import licenses, and specific barter agreements along with tariff restrictions. The legislative machinery supporting these trade agreements allowed instantaneous changes and it was evident that the country employing these new instruments of commercial warfare, with their facility of change, had a very pronounced advantage over the American producers.

Obviously three things could be done. First, permit our foreign markets to be taken from us and remain aloof. Second, increase our tariff restrictions and accelerate this loss. Third, employ the instrumentalities of our commercial competitors and attempt to regain some of this world trade.

The inadvisability of continuing our present policy would seem to be obvious. A country that contains 6 percent of the world's population, but produces 58 percent of the world's corn, 52 percent of its cotton, 34½ percent of its coal, 46½ percent of its copper, and has manufacturing capacity, even at times of highest domestic consumption, of from 15 percent to 20 percent over domestic demand, must do one of two things—reduce production or find a market. From the termination of the World War to 1929 we found a market by selling on credit. This credit, of course, could not be indefinitely extended and our tariff provision prevented foreign sales on any other basis; therefore, our opportunity to sell on credit came to a sudden stop at the beginning of the depression.

With the advent of the present administration we have attempted under planned economy to reduce production, our second alternative, and our same reactionary friends who advocate that tariff system which caused our trouble in the first place, are now telling us that this reduction of production is uneconomic and ruinously expensive. For once they are absolutely right, and the whole program, so far as this attack is concerned, would be indefensible if it were not for purely an emergency remedy. Reduced production will ultimately lead to oppressive taxes, and a lower standard of living which we will not willingly tolerate. Therefore, the opening of larger markets and increased consumption, both on our part and that of our foreign customers, to keep pace with modern productive methods is the only way out.

But these same reactionaries tell us that we cannot attempt to find a market for our surplus because that will necessitate buying something from somewhere outside of America. They disagreed with William McKinley, the martyred leader of the Republican Party, himself an author of a high tariff bill, who in his last utterance at Buffalo said:

The period of exclusiveness is past. Commercial wars are unprofitable; reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

Even former President Hoover, the reactionary of reactionaries, and the man who led the cohorts of reactionary thought when this country was being sent to the brink of destruction, also said:

In determining changes in our tariffs, we must not fail to take into account the broad interests of the country as a whole and such interests include our trade relations with other countries. It is obviously unwise protection which sacrifices a greater amount of employment in exports to gain a lesser amount of employment in imports.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Just what does the gentleman propose to buy abroad?

Mr. HARLAN. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that a very comprehensive survey is being made by experts of the Department of Commerce, but their report is not for publication at the present. To publish it now would do nothing but inject a lot of confusion and promote our old system of bloc voting, which has been the bane of every tariff law we have passed. Nothing is to be undertaken that has not been well considered, and nothing will be purchased that will materially injure any branch of American production.

Mr. KNUTSON. Very well. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARLAN. I do not have much time; I will yield if the gentleman will get me more time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman a minute.

If the gentleman were in charge of the administration of this law just what would he import?

Mr. HARLAN. Speaking for myself, I should import some Italian hats, some Dutch or Belgian lace, Irish linen; we could import probably many things, French wine and others. I have mentioned just a few of the things that we could import.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I may suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that he need have no worry about his rye, for in 1932 only 7 bushels were imported, while for the period between 1929 and 1932 the value of the rye exported decreased from $9,000,000 in 1929 to $1,000,000 in 1932.

Mr. KNUTSON. But may I remind the gentleman from Kentucky that in 1932 prohibition was still in effect. I quoted figures for 1932. Let us have them.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In my opinion, the 1932 figures will be still less; but I am giving official figures. I do not know whether the gentleman from Minnesota got his figures from a newspaper or not.

Mr. KNUTSON. We are giving official figures ourselves.

Mr. HARLAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota that we could import German cutlery made from Swedish steel. This steel, I am told, we cannot duplicate in this country. It is an entirely different kind of cutlery. We could import commodities of this kind which, while they bear the same general style of similar articles produced in this country, are yet of such a different quality that they supply a want that is entirely additional to those we have at present.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman wish to intimate that there is more kick in European rye than there is in American rye?

Mr. HARLAN. I am not an authority on rye; the specialty of my district is Bourbon.

The situation of our own country is a shining example when compared with Europe, of the advantages of a free interchange of commerce over commercial restrictions. Here we are living in the largest free-trade market in the world, the United States of America. In this community we have demonstrated, as if in a laboratory, that each man and each community prospers best by producing and exchanging with others those commodities which each community and each individual makes most effectively.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I want to suggest, if I may, that the 1932 election may be taken as a repudiation of that particular doctrine whether it be espoused by the Republican Party or by the Democratic Party.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman is entitled to his own interpretation of the 1932 election; frankly, I can see little connection.

Under the stimulation of this great market we have become world leaders in mass machine production. We have also become the world's largest per capita consumer.

Across the Atlantic we have exactly the opposite picture. Tariff walls and trade barriers have divided Europe into small trade-tight compartments. They have not been able to develop machine production as we know it because they are shut off from their natural market. They have specialized in hand production, with very limited use of machinery. The result is ineffectiveness, low wages, and a lower standard of living. We defend our tariff walls as a protection against this cheap labor. They build tariff walls against us because of our cheap machine labor—an obvious absurdity. The plain common sense and truth is that a great many of their hand-made commodities we never have made and are not temperamentally adapted to make. They are so different from our machine-made products as to supply in most cases an entirely different demand, a demand that is in addition to our present wants, a demand that seeks the artistic and beautiful, even though it is somewhat more expensive than uninspired utility. This demand is not in real competition with our machine-made products except to those highly imaginative gentlemen who conceived that bananas compete with apples and nonedible denatured cocoa oil competes with butter.

Just as we could use some of their laces, tapestries, linens, cutlery, and hats—just to mention a few—they could use quantities of our factory-made produce. They want it and need it but cannot get it because we will not accept the only thing they have to offer in payment. The exchange in both cases would cost little or nothing. From us it would be the produce of factories now idle; from them it would mean employment of hours now spent largely in worry.

Those who tell us that we must not trade with the world because a canning factory in Massachusetts or a hat factory in West Virginia will lose a few orders, forget two vital things: One, that all the canned fruit or hats we buy will probably be of a decidedly different quality than domestic machine-made production, and will supply a want entirely additional to the present demand for our domestic produce, and second that certainly everything that we buy will be paid for by the delivery of some other commodity which we make effectively with high wages, and greater profits, such as shoes, machinery, automobiles, or with farm produce now wasting in storage.

These same reactionaries also do not tell us how we are going to dispose of all the idle machinery, factory plants now available; or the 100,000,000 acres of fertile agricultural land which cannot be utilized for our own wants. What shall we do with the idle farmers and laborers when these plants and farms are permanently abandoned? There is but one answer—we must get a world outlet—we must increase our own consumption and raise our own standard of living, at the same time encouraging the higher standard of living in other parts of the world. We can easily absorb more of the commodities produced by the world in addition to our present wants, if thereby we can supply the world from our own surplus.

To accomplish this purpose, the adoption of the present bill is by far the most available method. Briefly, it authorizes the President to enter into contracts with foreign governments, granting trade concessions not in violation of any of our existing laws or treaties. These contracts will not require ratification by any branch of the Congress. To carry out such contracts, or for any other purpose, the President, by proclamation, may establish almost any other regulation or prohibition on foreign trade which he deems advisable, except that he cannot increase or decrease an import duty more than 50 percent or transfer any commodity between the free and dutiable lists.

Without going into the details of our tariff history, and of the powers that at different times have been granted to the President in declaring embargoes and other trade restrictions, since this has been covered very thoroughly by the majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means and also by the testimony introduced at the hearing, it is sufficient to say that this testimony is very clear—that the pending bill is an evolutionary step following our legislative methods from the beginning of the nineteenth century up to and including our last tariff enactment. It is the method which other nations have found effective in promoting their own trade at our expense. It will minimize the weaknesses of our present rigid tariff system. Some of these weaknesses are: Lack of stability in protection; failure as a revenue producer in depression period; local interests are protected at the expense of national interests; exporting interests are ignored; and, finally, inability to function effectively with rapidly changing conditions of our present domestic economic plan.

To my mind, however, the most important function of the proposed method of trade control is one that received very little, if any, attention during the hearing. Under these Presidential trade agreements it will be possible to establish a differential in tariff duties for the same commodity from the same country, depending upon the quantity imported. Let us consider an example: A very low rate may be made for, we will say, one fourth of 1 percent of our domestic consumption of some particular commodity. A higher rate for the next fourth of 1 percent, and for the last fraction of the permissible quota, before absolute prohibition is decreed, would amount to a rate high enough to be intended for almost complete prohibition. These higher-rate zones would become experimental zones of competition.

Those domestic industries which over a long period of years could not sell in competition with foreign producers in the domestic market in the higher tariff bracket would demonstrate to themselves and the world that they were too ineffective to be economically defensible. Capital invested in such industries could easily take notice; and as plants and machines became obsolete, this capital could flow into other channels without serious loss. Of course, it is entirely conceivable that from a viewpoint of military defense many industries which are not economically defensible ought to be maintained for our national safety, but this is a decidedly different question.

On the other hand, those domestic industries which could continuously sell in our market in competition with the low-tariff bracket import would demonstrate themselves to be effective and a safe place for capital investment.

Thus we could develop a laboratory with scientific data automatically and accurately produced to encourage our effective industries, promote our export, broaden the base of our imports, and create stability in our tariff revenue. There would then be no occasion for our present log-rolling, bloc-voting, local-interest type of tariff bills, which have caused so much scandal and corruption in the past, particularly during the last 12 years. We have no such accurate source of information now, and can never get it under the existing rigid tariff system.

In the past we Democrats, in our platform, have talked about rates "to insure equal competition." The Republican promise is equally benign when it agrees to secure rates "equalizing foreign and domestic costs." The simple fact is that both of these promises are chimera and nonsense.

There is no such thing as an American cost of production. Localities with cheap labor, available raw material, and cheap transportation have very different costs from other concerns in America manufacturing the same commodity under opposite conditions. The recent hearings before the N.R.A. board demonstrated that American industry did not even know, among the members of the same group, the labor cost or material cost in their own various industries in different parts of the country. Yet, many concerns with widely varying costs continue to exist in a country as large as ours because frequently the high-cost producer is near the market, while the low-cost producer either fails to effectively sell his commodity or is handicapped by large shipping costs. Foreign costs are even more impossible of attaining, because in that case, in addition to all the difficulties of obtaining domestic costs, the problem of absolute and relative costs is found to exist. For example, in some countries the monetary cost may be low, yet the relative cost, as considered with price indexes in other commodities, make these costs very high, or vice versa. If it were possible to arrive at a fair approximation of these costs, we would then be confronted with the high degree of variation in transoceanic shipping and the problem of equalizing seaboard costs with interior costs, which simply cannot be done. I believe that a frank statement from our Tariff Commission would admit that in all their decisions on these points they have attempted to do little else than make a benign guess.

With a system of graduated duties, however, it is obvious that the point where foreign and domestic goods could meet in free competition would be the exact amount of restriction necessary to equal foreign and domestic costs. If, in any contract period which cannot exceed 3 years in any event, it is found that the maximum import duty imposed is not sufficient to equalize the foreign and domestic costs, the manufacturer at least has the assurance under such a contract that the definite quota restriction will give him protection in any event. He does not have that assurance now under our tariff system.

In addition to this, when we confront a world of rising and falling currency values, the farce of the tariff promises of both parties is certainly apparent. This last difficulty absolutely demands a definite quota system to afford American industry the protection to which it is entitled. The American producer is asking no more than justice when he requires at least an approximation of the extent of the market which he may hope to supply. When the value of foreign currencies and international exchange is rising and falling like a mountain range, as it did in the midst of our recent panic, rigid tariff schedules furnish very little stable protection unless they are high enough to be absolute embargoes.

When the British Empire recently left the gold standard, it happened that American domestic trade also suddenly dropped. The natural conclusion of our producers was that British goods were flooding our market and driving out American competition. Many of us in Congress received such complaints. Investigation disclosed that in almost all cases, instead of an increase, there had been a decrease of British imports. Had our manufacturers felt secure behind a definite import quota, at least this stimulus to increase our local panic psychology would have been avoided.

Last June, during the first session of this Congress, I introduced House Resolution 179, requesting the Ways and Means Committee to investigate the import quota system with graduated duties. This bill was introduced without any knowledge whatsoever of the pending of our present plan. It was rather crude in its suggestion and unnecessarily cautious to avoid conflict with the unconditional most-favored-nation clauses in many of our treaties. Also, because of rather unfounded constitutional doubts over the question of delegating power over revenue-producing measures to the President, it recommended a system decidedly too rigid. However, with all its defects I am very much gratified that the basis of its plan can be carried out in the present bill and in a decidedly more effective manner. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUFFIN].

Mr. RUFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I was brought up on that old-fashioned southern doctrine of free trade and calomel. I know that some of you were brought up on a different theory. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not confronted with mere theories at this time in connection with the solution of some of these problems that are pressing down upon us. We are confronted with facts.

We have had at least a century of nationalism. The life and activities of Napoleon were responsible for the advent of nationalism. He probably did not realize that his life was having that effect upon the world, but nevertheless it did. By reason of his military activities there was a unification of Italy, a unification of Germany, and a unification of Austria-Hungary. Concomitant with this movement in Europe certain political and economic forces resulted in the final unification of the United States at the end of the Civil War. From 1871, which was the date of the formation of the German Empire, we have seen these forces of nationalism in operation to the fullest extent in the world. Political nationalism immediately preceded economic nationalism. We saw nationalism at its zenith during the great World War. We have, therefore, had an opportunity to come to some conclusions about this theory. I am frank to say that we are applying the principles of nationalism in this country now. So far as I am concerned, and I am speaking for myself only, I wish it were possible to adopt a plan upon a broader principle than the one we are now trying to put into operation in regulating our internal affairs, but we are compelled to adjust our plan to existing world conditions. This is the inevitable result of the continued pursuance of a policy of high tariffs. If one country pursues the policy of high tariffs, it, of necessity, forces other countries to pursue a similar course. This is inevitable. We are forced to do it because other countries have been doing so, and other countries are forced to do it because we have been pursuing this policy.

I know that all reasonable people in this country think that we ought to look after ourselves first. I have no fault to find with this doctrine, but I say that in its practical application the doctrine is not diametrically opposed to the doctrine of international trade. There are people who disagree with me concerning this principle. There are people who think that the one doctrine in its application is diametrically opposite to the other. I do not subscribe to this view myself. I think we can successfully pursue a policy by which we can be permitted to trade profitably with other countries of the world. I believe we can work out a policy, if we will take the time to do it, which will enable us to do this and at the same time will not place us absolutely at the mercy of these other countries. We can adopt a plan which in its application will not wreck any substantial industries in this country and which will, at the same time, afford us a much-needed market for our troublesome agricultural surpluses. This is what is contemplated in the measure we are now considering.

Of course, the question has been asked time and again here, from what products would you take the tariff, if you had the privilege of doing it. This is a matter which is deserving of the most careful consideration of whoever has the responsibility of doing this. I submit that we can bargain with other countries so that trade relationships may be established and sustained that will be helpful.

There are some who take the position in their arguments, it seems, that any tariff agreement we enter into with another country must, of necessity, adversely affect some industries in this country. To advance such an argument as this is to admit that, as time goes on, we shall have no opportunity of elevating our standards of living. It is readily discernible to me that we could, by raising our standards of living, consume products produced by other countries which in no way would substantially interfere with any products produced in this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the plain facts of the case, it is simply a question of what we can do, as a practical proposition, at this time. We could talk here incessantly for 2 years in an academic discussion concerning the most commendable attributes of the theory of economic nationalism and the most commendable attributes supporting the theory of economic internationalism. At the end of that time we would wind up where we started. What we are confronted with today, as I view it, is a practical proposition. Can we, as a government, devise a plan which will enable us to trade profitably with other countries without at the same time wrecking any substantial industries in this country? I believe we can. Because of the intricacies involved in the successful prosecution of such a plan, it would be impossible for the Congress to work out all the details. I think the right course to pursue is to give the executive arm of the Government a chance to expand our trade by virtue of the authority given to it under this law. The country has confidence in the ability and sincerity of the President. I think he will not abuse this authority when once it is given to him. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, had come to no resolution thereon.

DRAFTS DRAWN ON THE SECRETARY OF STATE BY AMERICAN EMBASSIES AT PETROGRAD AND CONSTANTINOPLE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State, to the end that legislation may be enacted to authorize an appropriation of not exceeding $44,403.15 for the payment of interest on funds represented by drafts drawn on the Secretary of State by the American Embassy in Petrograd and the American Embassy in Constantinople and transfers which the embassy at Constantinople undertook to make by cable communications to the Secretary of State between December 23, 1916, and April 21, 1917, in connection with the representation by the embassy of the interests of certain foreign governments and their nationals.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 24, 1934.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate:

The Senate requests the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1699) "to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription."

The request was granted.

THE PRESERVATION AND IMPROVEMENT OF THE PUBLIC RANGE

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the public domain bill and to include therein the report of the Secretaries.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement I made before the Public Lands Committee of the House February 19, 1934, in support of the bill H.R. 6462, and the reports thereon of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is unnecessary for me to say that I claim no individual authorship of this bill H.R. 6462. It is a composite outgrowth of many years' consideration by former Congressman Colton, of Utah; French, of Idaho; Sinnott, of Oregon; Evans and Leavitt, of Montana; myself and several other western Congressmen—trying to bring about this legislation and establish practically the same policy concerning the use of the remaining 173,000,000 acres of public domain, as now prevails upon the 137,000,000 acres of forest reserves. All those colleagues and friends of mine for many years have left the House; and I cannot resist saying that when they retired, they carried with them a world of experience, good judgment, and valuable information. One of the last things that several of them said to me was to request that I reintroduce this bill and carry on their efforts and enact it into law if possible. They very earnestly felt that the policies and principles of the orderly control and systematic use of the remaining public domain are of the very greatest importance to the welfare and proper development of the 11 great States of the West.

Concerning the bill, the title speaks for itself. It reads as follows:

"To stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes."

It very adequately and frankly expresses the purposes and objects and gives a complete idea of the whole subject.

There are three things contained in this bill: The first is "to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration." That is a great, important, and far-reaching conservation provision that everybody in the United States should be interested in. The second purpose is "to provide for the orderly and better use, improvement, and development of those 173,000,000 acres of public lands." The third purpose of the bill is "to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range" that extends throughout those 11 Western States. All three of those purposes are of the greatest and highest possible importance, and I will take them up serially.

The official reports before you of both the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture conclusively show what the rapidly increasing damage is to these lands because of erosion and overgrazing. Many thousands of acres that a few years ago were fine grazing lands are now nothing but barren wastes, sand dunes, and gravel beds, with scarcely a spear of grass or any other forage left on them. This deterioration is going on at an amazing pace. Naturally, many stockmen drive their stock wherever they can find good grazing, or any grazing; and they are not so much concerned about the future if they can find sufficient forage for the present.

If you gentlemen of the committee will read the very complete reports that were made in former years by Secretary Hyde, of the Department of Agriculture, and Secretary Wilbur, of the Interior Department, during the Hoover administration, you will find that they had made tremendously strong and statesmanlike reports on this matter. There has never been at any time the slightest tinge of politics in the consideration of this subject by the Departments or by this committee or by the House. Going back 12 or 15 years ago, when I had the honor of being the acting chairman of this committee, much of the time we frequently talked over this matter of the orderly control and proper and systematic use and development of our western country and discussed this matter of the stabilization of the stock industry on the public domain. You Members who do not live in that country may not realize that a herd of cattle or a flock of sheep are worth little or nothing unless the owner has a place to graze them; and in order to build up or maintain and stabilize the stock-raising industry there must be some assurance as to where and what kind of range they may have and depend upon for their stock, what they can definitely rely upon in the way of pasturage. Otherwise, there would be no permanence to the business. People who have herds would not be safe; they would have no credit with the banks for securing money. They cannot secure money from the banks if they cannot show that they have some definite and sufficient place on the range where their stock may be adequately grazed. At this time there are large areas where it is a free-for-all and general-grab and hold-if-you-can policy with roving herds using the range. There is no security or safety to honest stock business. We have had many sheep and cattle wars. For many years there has been more or less a kind of guerilla warfare going on between and among the sheepmen and cattlemen, with bitterness, strife, ill-will, and more or less litigation, and some sad killings. We want to terminate that condition. I fully realize the fears of some people about Federal regulations.

Nearly the entire population of the West 30 years ago put up a vehement, heroic, and desperately bitter fight against the establishment of the forest reserves. We insisted that it was a flagrant violation of our inherent, sacred, and inalienable rights, extending over a hundred years, to graze our stock on the open free range on the public lands. We insisted that Uncle Sam had no business to come in and regulate us by strong arm, or to charge us a grazing fee. We thoroughly believed that the Government was brazenly robbing us of one of our greatest western birthrights. We insisted that they had no right to tell us that we could only feed our stock here or there, as they saw fit; or that we could not feed them at some other place. We vehemently objected and vociferously swore at Gifford Pinchot; but we were unceremoniously overridden, in spite of everything we could do. Governor Pinchot was the leader in that movement. He was a crusader who for several years went all over that country making speeches; and President Theodore Roosevelt backed him up, and they carried out his policies. It was one of his greatest achievements to conserve the timber upon and bring about the orderly use of these 137 millions of acres of the public domain.

The original very laudable purpose of the Pinchot forest-reserve crusade was to save the forest and preserve the timber on the public domain from ruthless destruction and exploitation. But after President Roosevelt had put nearly one quarter of our entire States into a forest reserve, about half of which was either above or below the timber line and did not have a stick of merchantable timber on it, Senator Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, put a stop to that wholesale performance by passing the act of Congress of March 4, 1907, prohibiting the creation or extension of any more national forests except by act of Congress in Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washington, and Wyoming; and the act was reenacted on June 25, 1910; and in August 1924 the law was extended to California; and on June 15, 1926, it was extended to Arizona and New Mexico. Ever since, it has been the law applicable to those States; and ever since those dates, when any of us Members of Congress from those States have wanted to put any more land in the forest reserve, we have had to do so by the passing of a special bill for that purpose. I have passed about half a dozen or more of them myself.

I will digress just a moment to say that Senator Teller was "Colorado's grand old man." He was our first and one of the most useful and practically efficient Senators Colorado has ever had. He was my ideal of a public servant. He grandly and proudly represented our "Centennial State" in the United States Senate from the time it was admitted into the Union on August 1, 1876, for nearly 30 years. And during President Arthur's administration he was, we think in Colorado, the best Secretary of the Interior our country has ever had, primarily because he knew the West much better than any of the rest of them. He voluntarily retired from the Senate on March 4, 1909, the day I entered the House.

There are now in the forest reserves about 137,500,000 acres. About 14,000,000 acres are in my own State, and I think about 10,000,000 acres of it is in my congressional district. All placed in forest reserves over our most persistent and vehement objections. What is the result? Today there is nobody anywhere in the United States who would vote to throw those lands open to unrestricted use and free looting. Times have changed. No human being who has any foresight at all would today consent to turn those lands back to the law of the jungle, to free-for-all exploitations, and to the control and occupation by the Winchester. Now, President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his Cabinet officials are vigorously trying to do with the remaining 173,000,000 acres of public domain just exactly what President Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot did with the 137,000,000 acres that are in the forest reserves, trying to adopt some orderly process for the development and civilized use of those remaining lands outside of the forest reserves. We all now take off our hats to President Theodore Roosevelt, Governor Pinchot, and the other far-sighted conservationists in those former days. Within 5 years after this bill becomes a law, the entire country will pay the same tribute of respect to President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Secretaries Ickes and Wallace. Sometime all those lands will be administered by the same department. But it is not at all possible to do so at this time. It naturally looks as though that would be the ideal way of handling all that 300,000,000 acres of Uncle Sam's domain. But Secretary Fisher, Secretary Franklin K. Lane, Secretary Work, Wilbur, and several other Secretaries of the Interior have all for many years urged the enactment of this measure to give their Department some control over the public domain; but they have strenuously all this time insisted that so long as the patenting of all those lands, handling of the mineral rights, the oil rights, the land surveys, the geological surveys, and other matters are in progress, the handling of the public domain should necessarily remain exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. But I can see no reason why they should not in a few years administer them in coordination with the Agricultural Department.

Our greatest trouble for many years was that we were unable to get those two Departments to agree on anything. Finally, however, we did get Secretary Hyde and Secretary Wilbur to come to an agreement upon the matter; and the present Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and the present Secretary of the Interior Ickes, have simply adopted the policy of their two predecessors. They have very forcibly reported in favor of this bill, which is the same as the bill which passed the House last May or June, except as to the last section, 13. I, and most of the committee, strenuously opposed that section 13 of the former bill. It was forced into the bill on the floor of the House by gentlemen who were trying to kill the bill. That section provided that the measure should not take effect in any State until it was adopted by the State legislature of that State. That would mean, as the Secretary of the Interior has well said, that the State legislatures would practically control the Interior Department in its administration of the public lands, which, of course, would not be tolerated. I omitted that section when I reintroduced this bill as H.R. 6462; and therefore we have removed the objection which is so strenuously made by both the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior in their original reports. I made one other change in the bill: The Secretary of Agriculture asked that the division of the fees be made equal; that is, that 25 percent should go to the counties for roads and schools and that 25 percent should go for improvements; and I have written that provision in the bill, instead of making the division 15 and 85 percent as in the other bill, and to which objection was made. Therefore, those two main objections have been removed from the bill.

When the bill passed the House last year, and it went over to the Senate, Mr. Colton, Mr. French, Mr. Leavitt, and Mr. Evans of Montana, and several others of us went before the Senate Public Lands Committee and presented the bill very fully and forcibly. But at that time some of the Senators were talking about and hoping to pass a bill to cede all the public domain to the States. Principally, Senator Kendrick, of Wyoming, and Senator Walsh, of Montana, both of whom have since passed to their reward, and both of whom were wonderful men, felt that if they could transfer these lands to the States, the States might better administer them. But, as we very emphatically and I think conclusively stated to them, and as this committee and everybody else know, it is absolutely a human impossibility to convey the public domain to the States without reservations of the subsurface rights.

At first blush, that looks very simple and all right and fine for the States. But when you investigate the matter, when you study what it means and especially when you get the reaction from the very strong and wide-spread conservation sentiment throughout the country and encounter the very emphatic opposition of all the administration's forces of this and all former administrations, you will find you are butting your head against a very solid stone wall.

When it comes to conveying the 173,000,000 acres of public domain that Uncle Sam owns, from the blue sky to the center of the earth, to the States, I know and all the old Members know that Congress will not vote for that kind of bill. I doubt if, after you study the matter, you could get half a dozen votes in this committee to do such a thing. You could not get the support of this or any other committee, and you could not get any appreciable support in the House for that sort of measure. It is utterly idle to talk about it at this time. It is a very much larger and more complicated subject than some of you may realize. President Hoover's large Public Lands Commission, which held meetings and hearings for some 2 years, recommended that the surface only of the public lands be conveyed to the States. However, no State would be willing to accept that kind of title. Therefore, there is an absolutely impassable barrier to anything of that kind; and it is a waste of time to discuss it. In the meantime, there have been several bills pending to set aside districts; and two of them have passed. Congressman Leavitt, of Montana, passed one creating the so-called "Mizpah-Pumpkin Creek" grazing district in Montana, turning it over to the Interior Department. I understand they are getting along satisfactorily with that one, and I think there was one other bill for that purpose. However, that is piecemeal work, and many of those bills have been held up for the past 2 or 3 years, in the hope that this general measure would pass. In that connection, I might say, I think, without any violation of confidence, that the Secretary of the Interior felt very greatly disappointed that we did not pass this bill last summer, because, I understand, he had hoped that he might establish many of these C.C.C. camps on the public domain, besides those on the forest reserves and in the national parks and monuments. He could have done an immense amount of work on the public domain with those boys, in the way of preventing fire hazards, of creating and preserving watering places, building trails, improving the range, and in a hundred other ways; but he said he would not do that so long as he had no control over it, and he has not done so. He would not make important improvements of that sort when anybody could come along and locate on it as a stock-raising homestead, and in that way monopolize the benefit of what had been done.

Therefore, with one exception in Wyoming, none of those camps have been located upon that great area of 173,000,000 acres. None was located there, although they might have had probably 40 or 50 of those camps out there, operating to the marvelous benefit of all those 11 States. He felt, apparently, that if Congress did not see fit to authorize a systematic, orderly development and use and control of that range, he ought not to assume the responsibility of spending public money upon it. Of course, this is entirely a matter for the determination of Congress. It is something that is entirely within our jurisdiction. The failure to pass the bill last June has worked a very great loss to hundreds of unemployed young men in those 11 States.

If I may digress a moment, the 640-acre stock-raising homestead law has been referred to frequently in this hearing. I think it would be interesting to the members of this committee for me to say that my relation to the bill creating that law was something similar to my relation to this pending bill. About 1913 Congressman Ferguson, of New Mexico, and I prepared the original draft of that law. And he introduced the bill and worked desperately hard for about 2 years, until he retired from Congress, trying to pass the bill, and his failure to do so was a very great disappointment to him. I reintroduced the bill, and after a struggle of a year or more succeeded in passing it. It became a law on December 29, 1916. I thought—and many of us western Members thought—it was a great piece of constructive legislation in behalf of settling up the public domain by homesteaders that could not make a living upon 160 acres of land. It has been a marvelously beneficial law. Up to June 30, 1933, 24,326,349 acres of land had gone to patent under that law and have been placed on the tax rolls of the counties in which they are situated. There are now pending applications under that law for about 17,000,000 acres more; and the total amount of land that has been heretofore designated and classified as subject to stock-raising homesteads throughout the West aggregates the gigantic amount of 124,669,640. In fact, 85 percent of all homestead applications made nowadays are under that law. I thought I was rendering a great service to our country in piloting that bill through Congress and was quite universally complimented for many years; but in recent years the law has been abused, especially in Colorado, and I understand to some extent in some other States. I think it has been and is now being used as a subterfuge in many cases.

I will not personally assume the responsibility of calling a large number of the applicants for entries "dummies"; but I will say that it is reported to me that not one out of a dozen of those so-called "stock-raising homestead entries" are actually occupied in good faith as a home by the homesteader and his family, really living and making a living on the 640 acres of land as the law contemplates. And for that reason I have been repeatedly appealed to to repeal that law. And the Commissioner of the General Land Office has repeatedly officially recommended that that law should be repealed. Many people complain that it has been used as a subterfuge, for large stockmen to control the range rather than in good faith to make actual homesteads. And I understand that the Land Office officials have canceled many entries for that purpose; and there have been a number of proseutions and some convictions for frauds perpetrated under that law. I introduced a general bill to repeal it in the last Congress; and I have introduced another bill, H.R. 2861, in this Congress to repeal the law as it affects the State of Colorado. But the law has been of very great benefit to the other States, and the sentiment in those States is very strongly opposed to its repeal. The Members from those States insist that the law has been tremendously beneficial in putting lands on the tax-roll that would never have been patented otherwise, and in requiring the owners to help support the schools and the county government. It has greatly helped in settling up the West. I think with the exception of the original 160-acre homestead law, no law has ever been enacted by Congress that has brought about the entry of as large a number of acres of land as this one law has. So that I am still really proud of being the nominal author of that law, notwithstanding I seriously deplore and regret the abuse and perversion that have been made of it in some localities.

Returning to the bill before us I may say this bill originally started with about a dozen lines, just putting all this public domain under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, to be administered for the general welfare of the Government and for the public good. But we have been adding to it all the time until now the bill contains 10 pages, consisting quite largely of just unnecessary regulations written into the bill. The Secretary could do practically everything that is provided for in the bill if we had simply turned it over to him. Nearly all these things could be provided for by regulations. However, many people are not willing to just give carte blanche provisions of that kind in the bill. They, with some justification, feel that there are some things that they should specifically provide for or reserve in the law itself for their guaranty. There are several gentlemen here representing those various sentiments.

There are two distinguished lawyers here from my district, Mr. Dan H. Hughes, of Montrose, Colo., representing himself and also the proprietors of half a million sheep; and I bespeak for him a full hearing and the very careful consideration of this committee of whatever amendments he may offer. There is also here Mr. F. R. Carpenter, of Hayden, Colo., one of the most prominent and best-informed cattlemen in the State. He is in the city representing the cattlemen of western Colorado in connection with the bill making cattle a basic industry, and no one knows the range conditions of our State better than he, and he will frankly answer any questions anyone may ask about the range-cattle business. There are many other interests represented here. But I think all of them fully realize that we absolutely have got to sometime soon come to some system of governing the use of those public lands.

There are many vested rights, which should and must be respected and protected, which have grown up on the range. There are involved the rights of some who graze across State lines; and, naturally, they do not want those rights destroyed. They do not want to take any chances. Now, I have not the slightest objection to any reasonable amendments to this bill that will preserve those rights. They feel that if the number of stock, for instance, that some stockmen are running must be cut down, there should be a provision in this bill that the number of stock shall not be reduced more than 10 percent in any one year. I think that is a reasonable and fair request, so as not to put them out of business or to seriously injure them. Secretary Ickes has said to this committee that he is not in favor of reducing the herds, but of sending the excess number of stock to some other range. Certainly, as to those reasonable requests for common-sense regulations that are made in good faith, in order to protect vested rights, the committee should and undoubtedly will consider them very carefully and grant them. However, the principle, the main purpose or policy that is before the committee, is the conservation, the systematic use and orderly control of this vast public domain. Putting and maintaining it in a position where it will be of greater benefit and a greater asset to the public instead of being a liability, that is the question before this committee. If I may make a personal reference, I will say that I own three small ranches, and all of them are right adjoining the forest reserves and almost adjoining my home town of Glenwood Springs, Colo. I located and proved up upon one of them myself under the desert land law. So I have intimate personal knowledge of the forest reserves. Besides having some nine or ten millions of acres of forest reserves in my congressional district, I have something like that much public domain outside of the forest reserves; and I have lived right there nearly 50 years.

My father was a cattleman all his life, and I sat in a saddle most of the time for several years when I was a boy, and I have lived among stockmen all my life. The public domain and the forest reserves ramify every part of all of the 24 large counties in my district, which is the western half of Colorado. I travel over most of those counties nearly every year in an automobile, and I can tell usually within about a mile or so whether I am in a forest reserve or outside of it. I tell by the fact that the forage in the forest reserve is well preserved. It is being maintained and kept up; it is not overgrazed. But as soon as I get outside of the forest reserve, I notice the difference. In some places, even the grass roots have been pulled up. Of course, that is done by too many sheep. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it certainly does seem to me that in considering a far-sighted policy, we ought to seriously consider and give great weight to the judgment and wishes of our public officials who have the administration of the forest reserves and the public domain. All the officials of our Government that have jurisdiction over both the public domain and the forest reserves are here before you. The forest reserve, represented here by Mr. F. A. Silcox, the Forester and Chief, and Associate Forester E. A. Sherman, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Fred W. Johnson, with his force, are present.

All those officials of both this administration and of President Hoover's administration have come before this committee, and all of them unanimously have appealed to you to favorably consider and report this bill. There is not a dissenting voice. They all join in requesting this legislation. They are not wedded definitely to the exact language of the bill. But, as the chairman has well said, there is not a line in these 10 pages that has not been gone over and over time and again. There is nothing that has been placed in here without careful consideration. There is no guess work about it. This bill has been before Congress year after year, and all its provisions have been very thoughtfully studied by this committee. It has also been carefully studied by the people generally throughout those 11 Western States, and some of the eastern people have taken an interest in it from a purely patriotic and conservation standpoint. They have been helpful to us. Of course, it more directly affects us. There are many millions of sheep and hundreds of thousands of head of cattle in those States, and it is very vital to our country that the stock-raising industry on that vast range be stabilized and systematized. That is what we are asking you to do. I have not the slightest desire or intention to do an injustice to any large stock owner. They are usually able to take care of themselves. And I have no objections to any necessary amendments to the bill to safeguard their vested rights. But I appeal to you most earnestly on behalf of the small ranchman, the little fellow—the homesteader with a few cows and work horses and possibly a few cattle or a little bunch of sheep. He is the man I am appealing for and am the most concerned about. I appeal to you to protect him and his family and his home and his little band of stock.

This law would be a godsend to those people who cannot come here and speak for themselves. This inaugurates a new policy; and, of course, we may get objections from some man here or there who fears this law might interfere with his range. Some of the large sheep outfits fear that the Secretary might regulate them more than they would like. Then some complain that there would be a double grazing charge. But I can say to the committee definitely, from my many conferences with both Secretaries Wilbur and Ickes, and Hyde and Wallace, and their assistants, with all of whom I have been closely associated—as some of you know because of my work on the Interior Department appropriation committee—that they have no thought of prescribing fees that will be any burden upon the stockmen. As Secretary Ickes has so stated to you, they have forces of men from the General Land Office and the Geological Survey, inspectors and others, working on the public domain. But they have no legal authority to say to a man, "Mr. Jones, you must not put more than so many head of cattle or so many head of sheep on this range, because it will not bear any more than that number, and you can put the rest of them over on another range which you can take." The western part of my congressional district was formerly the Ute Indian Reservation. It is the newer part of the "Centennial State." It is one of the greatest stock countries in the United States. I represent several thousand of cattlemen and sheepmen and many thousands of small ranchmen, homesteaders of very limited means. Having lived right among those people nearly all my life and having been supported by most of them and sent to Congress to represent them for nearly 26 years, I would be the last one in the world to try to inflict any hardship upon any one of them. Of course, it will take some time to readjust the grazing rights, but both Secretaries assure us that the Interior Department will have the full benefit and cooperation and experience of the Agricultural Department and the Forest Service in inaugurating practically the same system that is working so well on its forest reserves.

I firmly believe that this is a condition that we have got to face sooner or later. This law should have been enacted 20 years ago. I feel that it is a patriotic duty that we owe the country to take this bill up and amend it if and wherever necessary to protect all kinds of vested rights. If necessary, you should add provisions to take care of mining rights, vested rights in waterholes, and things of that kind. I believe the wording of the bill is broad enough to cover all those various phases. If you will take this bill up and analyze it, section by section, and go over it thoroughly, I do not believe that anybody's just rights will be violated. Of course, those are matters for you to consider. I ask you to give careful consideration to all the amendments that are proposed by the various interests.

In conclusion, if you will pardon a personal prophecy, I venture to predict that of all the very many vast, untried, and tremendously important bills we are enacting in this Seventy-third Congress that history will record that none of them are of more universal and far-reaching benefit to our country than this gigantic conservation measure, applying as it does to one ninth of the entire area of the United States; and that every one of you gentlemen and the gracious lady member of this committee in the years to come will be supremely proud of having taken part in placing this great measure upon the statute books of our country.

The endorsement of this measure by the President of the United States is contained in a letter to Secretary Ickes, which I will insert as a part of my remarks, as follows:

WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, D.C., February 21, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have discussed with you and the Secretary of Agriculture, Congressman TAYLOR's bill, H.R. 6462, to give to the Secretary of the Interior the power of regulating grazing on the public domain.

I favor the principle of this bill; and you and the Secretary of Agriculture are authorized to say so to the House Committee on the Public Lands.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

I insert a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the Chairman of the Rules Committee, which is self-explanatory, and is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 16, 1934.

HON. EDWARD W. POU,

Chairman Committee on Rules,

House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POU: The Taylor grazing bill, H.R. 6462, reported favorably from the Public Lands Committee last week, has the endorsement of the President, and its passage is being strongly urged by both Secretary Wallace and myself.

I regard this bill as the most important measure which the Department of the Interior has before Congress this session, and anything which you can do to bring it before the House for consideration at an early date will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

The Rules Committee has granted a rule for the consideration of the bill, authorizing 3 hours of general debate to be followed by the full consideration of the bill for amendments in the ordinary manner under the 5-minute rule.

I insert a letter of the former Secretary of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, to the chairman of this committee, dated May 9, 1932, as follows:

H.R. 11816 has received very careful consideration in this Department, and it is believed to be a workable and desirable piece of legislation. Its benefits will not only be local, but State- and Nation-wide.

I recommend early and favorable action.

Very truly yours,

RAY LYMAN WILBUR, Secretary.

The bill H.R. 11816 of the Seventy-second Congress was substantially the same as this bill 6462.

I also insert a part of a letter from the former Secretary of Agriculture, Arthur M. Hyde, to the chairman of this committee, dated May 7, 1932, in reference to H.R. 11816, as follows:

I am transmitting herewith a detailed analysis of this measure prepared at my request by the Chief of the Forest Service. I cannot too strongly urge that comprehensive legislation of this character receive your prompt and favorable consideration. The remaining public unreserved lands are too great a potential agricultural asset for the Nation to longer neglect and ignore. Their use should be regulated and their values conserved in a businesslike, common-sense way in the interest not only of the present users but their posterity as well.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR M. HYDE, Secretary.

I insert two reports by Secretary of the Interior Ickes and one by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace. These reports refer to the same bill. This bill was formerly introduced in the Seventy-second Congress by Congressman Colton, of Utah, and it passed in the House as H.R. 11816, and failed in the Senate. I reintroduced the bill on March 10, 1933, as H.R. 2835. I afterward eliminated the section 13 referred to in those reports and reintroduced the bill on January 5 of this year as H.R. 6462. All three bills are practically identical, excepting that the present bill does not contain the section 13 that both Secretaries, the General Land Office, and the Forest Service all vigorously opposed, and this bill authorizes 25 percent of the receipts from grazing fees to be expended upon improvements of the range, instead of 15 percent, as in the former bill.

TO PROVIDE FOR THE ORDERLY USE, IMPROVEMENT, AND PRESERVATION OF THE PUBLIC RANGE

REPORTS OF SECRETARY OF INTERIOR AND SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

The bill is analyzed and fully explained in the reports from the Secretary of the Interior and from the Secretary of Agriculture on H.R. 2835 (Congressman TAYLOR's previous grazing bill, which for all practical purposes is substantially the same as H.R. 6462), which reports are herein set out in full and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 2, 1933.

HON. RENÉ L. DEROUEN,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DEROUEN: Since May 22, when I submitted my report on H.R. 2835, a bill to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes, I have given further consideration to the measure in connection with the administration of the provisions of the act of March 31, 1933, Public No. 5, Seventy-third Congress, known as the "Emergency Conservation Work Act" for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful work, and in view of the rapidity with which important problems have developed and the necessity of formulating broad and comprehensive plans for carrying forward this important measure without interruption during the next 2 years, the following supplemental report is submitted:

The act of March 31, 1933, provides, among other things, for the—

"Prevention of . . . flood and soil erosion . . . and such other work on the public domain, national and State, and Government reservations incidental to or necessary in connection with any project of the character enumerated."

This has led Mr. Robert Fechner, Director of Emergency Conservation Work, the Advisory Council, and this Department, to give careful consideration to what might be done to prevent, or at least check in some degree, the injuries that are resulting to the public domain through the lack of adequate control or regulatory authority in this Department.

The United States Supreme Court has held that the public lands are a grazing common for the use of the public, and Congress has given this Department, which is charged with the administration of the public lands, but very limited authority to control their use. Through their abuse the balance of nature has been so disturbed that the 173,000,000 acres of the public domain that remain vacant, unappropriated, and unreserved stand in great need of work such as is contemplated by the aforesaid act. These lands are confined largely to 11 of the Western States, as follows: Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

As distressing as the need is for arresting this deterioration and instituting restorative measures, it would be unsound, economically, to include such work in the conservation program in the absence of a satisfactory future control of the lands benefited and the permanency and continued maintenance of such projects.

The proposed bill, in addition to its inherent merits, would clothe this Department with the power to regulate the use of the remaining public lands as to justify the undertaking of important work looking to flood control, the protection of watersheds and water supplies, the checking of erosion, and the regulation of grazing, including the development of water holes and stock driveways. I cannot too earnestly emphasize the tremendous importance of the bill, which, if promptly enacted into law, would be a great step forward in the interest of true conservation and would furnish work upon which thousands of unemployed citizens could be engaged in the late fall and winter when work in the conservation camps in the higher altitudes of the national parks and forests will be impossible.

As to the bill itself, my report of May 22 calls attention to the objectionable feature of section 13. At the expense of repetition I again voice my opposition to vesting any State with veto power over the utilization by the Federal Government of its public lands. I also invite attention to the fact that when the bill was before the Seventy-second Congress, first session, as H.R. 11816, and favorably reported upon by this Department, section 10 provided for a payment of 25 percent of the moneys received from each grazing district, during any fiscal year, to the State in which the grazing district was situated. This proposed payment was, upon the committee's recommendation, increased by the House from 25 to 35 percent. Section 500, title 16, U.S.C., provides—"that 25 percent of all moneys received during any fiscal year from each national forest shall be paid at the end of such year by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State in which such national forest is situated . . ."

It will thus be seen that the percentage to be paid the States from funds derived from grazing on the public lands, under the proposed legislation, is 35, whereas the percentage to be paid the States from funds derived from grazing on the national forest is but 25.

As you of course know, the status of the lands within the national forest reservations is such that the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, has been able lawfully to control and manage grazing upon the lands in such reservations, both as to the number of head to be grazed and the season of grazing. The improvement and development of the forest range under such control is unquestioned, but at the same time the regulating of the seasonal use of the forest areas has been one of the contributing factors in the overgrazing of the public lands.

H.R. 2835 will not only assist in stabilizing the livestock industry but will permit the coordinating of the grazing use of both the public lands and forest reservations. It will also prevent the disintegration and destruction of the public range and meet the crisis that will doubtless be reached in the fall and winter when thousands of the emergency conservation workmen will be driven from their summer camps.

I again most earnestly recommend that H.R. 2835, when amended, be enacted into law.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 22, 1933.

HON. RENÉ L. DEROUEN,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DEROUEN: I have received your request for report on H.R. 2835, a bill to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

With the exception of their mineral content and of limited areas suitable for cultivation after being reclaimed by the application of water, most of the remaining public domain is valuable chiefly for grazing. The policy of the Government has permitted or tolerated grazing on the unreserved public lands by sufferance without control or regulation. With the exception of two small areas in Montana and in California, where special acts have authorized regulation by the Secretary of the Interior, neither this Department nor any other department of the Government has the authority to prevent overgrazing or to in any manner protect or develop the forage on the public lands. The result has been overgrazing, diminution or destruction of the forage crops, with resultant soil deterioration and erosion. Moreover, in addition to destruction of the forage, which results in the public lands being incapable of sustaining the number of livestock which they could under proper control, those engaged in the livestock industry have no certainty of tenure in their grazing use of the public lands. This situation seems now to be thoroughly realized both by local organizations and individuals interested in the livestock industry and by Congress.

This Department has received numerous communications urging regulation and control of the grazing resources for the public benefit. It is believed to be in the interest of the public, of those engaged in the industry, and for the best protection, improvement, and development of the lands to have a uniform policy applicable to all the public lands in the Western States.

H.R. 2835, now 6462, as indicated by its title, is a general bill, applicable to all public lands of the United States outside of Alaska and not included in national forests, parks, and monuments, or Indian reservations.

Section 1 of the bill would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish grazing districts or additions thereto, subject to prior existing valid claims.

Section 2 would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make the necessary rules and regulations and to do those things necessary to carry out the purposes of the act.

Section 3 would authorize the issuance of permits to graze livestock in such grazing districts to homesteaders, residents, and other owners of livestock, upon payment annually of reasonable fees, the permits to be issued to individuals, groups, or associations for not exceeding 10 years, but subject to renewal in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary is authorized to specify from time to time the numbers of stock to be grazed and the seasons of use of such districts. Provision is made for remission, reduction, or refund of grazing fees during certain specified emergencies.

Section 4 permits the placing of such improvements as fences, wells, reservoirs, etc., upon permitted areas in connection with their development and use.

Section 5 authorizes the Secretary to permit limited free grazing within such districts of livestock kept for domestic purposes and also to permit the use under existing laws or future laws of timber, stone, gravel, etc., by bona-fide settlers, miners, residents, and prospectors.

Section 6 expressly continues in force in such districts, the laws of Congress authorizing the granting of rights-of-way and for the prospecting, locating, developing, entering, leasing, or patenting of the mineral resources.

Section 7 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to examine and classify lands in grazing districts which are valuable and suitable for agriculture and to open such areas to homestead entry in tracts not exceeding 160 acres.

Section 8, recognizing that these districts will necessarily frequently contain lands in private ownership or owned by States or railroads, makes provision for the Secretary, in his discretion, to make exchanges of lands for the mutual benefit of those concerned.

Section 9 requires the Secretary to provide for suitable regulations for cooperation with local associations of stockmen and with such supervisory boards as may be named by such associations. The views of these boards are to be given consideration in the administration of the area. This section also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to accept contributions toward the administration, protection, and improvement of the district.

Section 10 provides that all moneys received, except those under the preceding section 9 and under section 11 of the bill which relates to Indian lands, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States; and thereafter 15 percent of the moneys shall be utilized for the improvement of the range and 35 percent of the receipts shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State in which the district is situated, to be expended as the State legislature may prescribe for the benefit of public schools and public roads of the county or counties in which the district is situated.

Section 11 deals with lands which have been ceded to the United States by Indians for disposition under the public-land laws upon condition that the receipts therefrom shall be credited to the Indians. It provides that all grazing fees, less 15 percent, shall be deposited to the credit of the Indians; also that, pending such final payment, the public-land laws of the United States relating to said Indian-ceded lands shall continue in operation subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 12 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cooperate with any department of the Government in carrying out the purposes of the act and in the coordination of range administration, particularly where the same stock grazes part time in a public-domain grazing district and part time in a national forest or other reservation.

Section 13 provides that the act shall not become effective in any State until after approval by the legislature of such State, and that each State may designate one or more representatives or officials with whom the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make and enter into suitable agreements for cooperative administration of grazing on public lands and lands owned or controlled by the State which shall be subject to rules agreed upon and promulgated by "both the Secretary of the Interior and said State."

The first provision in said section 13 is unprecedented, so far as I am aware, in legislation affecting the public lands of the United States and has the effect of impairing or defeating the control of the United States over its own lands. In other words, it authorizes and vests in a State the veto power over utilization by the Federal Government of its public lands. The provision for agreements for cooperation in administering areas, including both public and State lands, contained in section 13 is unnecessary because such right exists in other provisions of the bill and under the general authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

The last provision, which requires the rules and regulations to be agreed upon both by the Secretary of the Interior and the State, again divests the United States of control of its own property and is in my opinion undesirable. Cooperation is provided for and contemplated in section 9 of the bill with local interests, and in section 12 of the bill, with other Government departments.

I therefore recommend that the bill be enacted into law, provided section 13 thereof is eliminated.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Memorandum for the Secretary.

PROPOSED REPORT ON H.R. 2835, THE SO-CALLED "GRAZING BILL"

For more than 10 years the enactment of a law authorizing the regulation of stock grazing on the public domain has been under consideration by the Congress. It is the belief of the officials of this Office that during this entire period a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate favored such regulation, but that minor differences of opinion concerning matters not vital caused postponement of action.

The range users have never been entirely united in support of a particular measure. There have been differences of opinion between those having large outfits and those controlling only a few head of stock, and a wider difference of opinion between stockmen and sheep raisers.

A number of the States have objected upon the theory that the establishment of a grazing district would restrict the State in its indemnity selections.

Others object because they prefer an enlargement of the provisions of the stock-raising homestead law. The most recent objection urged against the control of grazing is from those advocating turning the lands over to the States. They express the fear that if the Federal Government enters upon a control policy it will not consent to giving the public lands to the several States.

Something must be done to protect the forage growths or the grazing value of the lands will be destroyed. As a matter of conservation it is essential that destructive overgrazing be ended.

FRED W. JOHNSON, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, June 5, 1933.

HON. RENÉ L. DE ROUEN,

Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,

House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DE ROUEN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 23 requesting the views of this Department upon the bill (H.R. 2835) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

The subject of the bill is one of particular importance at the present moment. Under the provisions of the act approved March 31, 1933 (Public, No. 5, 73d Cong.) an opportunity now exists to conduct on the unreserved public lands a number of activities which will conserve and enhance their public values. The initiation of those activities will at the same time afford a wide field for constructive and creative work by the members of the Emergency Conservation Corps created by the act of March 31, 1933, and will afford many opportunities for profitable employment by members of the corps within their homes or adjoining States. These reasons in themselves would seem to warrant early and favorable consideration of the measure.

There are, however, a number of other important considerations of public interest which would seem to justify early and constructive action upon the bill. The 173,318,000 acres of unreserved and unappropriated public lands represent slightly more than 9 percent of the total land area of the continental United States. They occur in some degree in 24 of the States but all save a negligible part are now to be found in the 11 Western States commonly referred to as the "public-land States." These lands form large and important parts of the watersheds upon which the majority of the irrigation projects are dependent and of many streams of value for purposes of water transportation. They are in large part the bases of the western livestock industry, one of the major industries of the Western States, and any deterioration or improvement in their forage productive quality or value profoundly affects the economic interests of those States. This thought is strikingly confirmed by the concern now felt by some western transcontinental railroads over the falling-off in the volume of livestock shipments in recent years and in apparent relation to the decline in the productivity of the western range lands. Coincident with the main purposes or uses of these lands are certain related uses for purposes of outdoor recreation or as habitats for wild animals and birds.

There now is wide-spread recognition of the fact that the uncontrolled use of these lands during the past half century has gravely impaired their social and economic value. Unseasonal and excessive grazing has caused a progressive deterioration in the vegetative cover over much of the land, so that both in density and palatability it is markedly inferior to what it was during earlier stages of occupancy and use. A natural concomitant of the destruction or impairment of the protective vegetative cover has been an acceleration of soil movement or erosion, which not only has reduced the value of the lands from which the soil has been moved but has also reduced the value of irrigation and power reservoirs, canals, ditches, etc., through increased sedimentation. The impairment of the value of the lands themselves also impairs the value of other lands, utilities, and services.

In recognition of these facts the Department of Agriculture during the past quarter century consistently has advocated the systematic control and management of the public lands. The practicability and effectiveness of such management has abundantly been demonstrated within the national forests. The Department in its advocacy of public-land regulation has been motivated by two major objectives: One, a better correlation between the use of the national forests administered by the Department and the closely related use of the unreserved public lands; the other, the general purpose of the Department to promote the sound and systematic use and betterment of all lands chiefly valuable for farm-crop production or pasturage. Proper control and regulation of the unreserved public lands appreciably would simplify the work of this Department in national-forest management and in land economic problems.

In its present form, however, the bill H.R. 2835 contains three provisions to which this Department cannot give its approval. These provisions were not in the bill as originally introduced, but occur as amendments by the House Committee on Public Lands. Specifically they are as follows:

Page 6, lines 16, 17, and 18: The interpolation of the words "county or if any suitable lands cannot be found in the county, in any other part of the same . . ." unnecessarily restricts the exchange authority granted by this section in that before any exchange could be made it would be necessary to carefully determine and certify that no suitable lands could be selected in the county containing the offered lands. This seems to be a needless restriction. There is no such restriction in the General Exchange Act of March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), applicable to national forests, and it is not apparent that one is necessary in the bill H.R. 2835. It, therefore, is recommended that the words quoted be deleted.

Page 8, line 23: Section 10 of the bill provides "an additional 35 percent of the money received from each grazing district during any fiscal year shall be paid at the end thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State in which such grazing district is situated. . . ." The comparable payment from national-forest receipts under the provisions of the act approved May 23, 1908 (35 Stat. 260), is 25 percent. No reason is evident why the proportion of gross receipts from the grazing districts payable to the counties should be greater than the proportion payable from national-forest receipts. Careful studies hitherto made have demonstrated that 25 percent of national-forest gross receipts plus other expenditures by the Federal Government for road and trail construction, improvements, etc., generally approximate and sometimes exceed the maximum amount that the county probably could derive from the same lands were they subject to private appropriation and taxation. It should be remembered that while the lands which would be affected by the bill H.R. 2835 are in the main freely open to appropriation and entry, they have continued unappropriated, presumably because nobody considered them worthy of appropriation, and at present the counties derive no revenues from them. An allowance of 35 percent of the gross receipts from the grazing districts which would be created by the bill H.R. 2835 therefore would seem to be in excess of the country's equitable share in the return from such lands, and I am strongly of the opinion that the percentage payable to the counties should not exceed 25 percent; accordingly I recommend that line 23 of page 8 should be so amended.

Section 13 of the act not only seems to contemplate but apparently would make mandatory "the cooperative administration of public grazing upon such public lands of the United States, and the lands owned by, or subject to the control of, said State or any political subdivision thereof, which shall be subject to such rules and regulations as shall be agreed upon and promulgated by both the Secretary of the Interior and said State." The effect of this section apparently would be to give a State containing unreserved and unappropriated public lands a dominant voice in determining the principles and plans of management to which such lands would be subject and thus would make it impossible for the Federal Government freely to adopt or execute desirable plans of land use and management except where State concurrence was secured. The preponderance of available factual data seems strongly to demonstrate that the requirements of public interest and safety will necessitate not only more carefully planned use of land but extensive programs of remedial action to check the adverse results of past abuse of lands. As the trend assumes more definite form it becomes increasingly apparent that the larger part of this program must be undertaken by the Federal Government. It, therefore, seems quite inappropriate for the Federal Government to enact legislation applicable to almost one tenth of its total land area which will impose additional restraint and restrictions upon such action as may be found necessary in the public interest. The retention in the bill of section 13 apparently would mean that while the Federal Government would have all of the expense of administering and improving the public lands, the States containing such lands would not only derive practically all of the benefits of such administration and improvement but also would largely have the power to determine the principles or forms of management and conditions of use. An opportunity thus is created for an aggressively presented local interest to dominate the broader and more important national interest. For the reasons given the total elimination of section 13 from the bill is recommended.

Subject to the changes herein proposed the bill H.R. 2835 would be entirely acceptable to the Department of Agriculture. The reasonable assumption is that the Department of the Interior, under the authority contained in the bill, would develop principles and plans of range management which in general would be in harmony with the system which has been developed within the national forests during the past 28 years. The stockmen using the national-forest ranges during the summer seasons thus would secure stability and certainty of tenure upon the unreserved public lands which form their spring and fall and sometimes their winter ranges, and thus could develop their enterprises in more permanent and constructive ways than is practicable under the hitherto prevailing conditions of complete uncertainty as to their continued use of the ranges upon which their operations depend. The proposed legislation would be beneficial not only to the two Departments concerned but to the great majority of the States containing unreserved and unappropriated public lands. As stated above, it also would be most timely to the degree that it makes possible constructive work on public lands under the provisions of the Emergency Conservation Act of March 31, 1933. I heartily recommend its enactment, if amended as suggested.

This matter was referred to the Budget Bureau, as required by Budget Circular 49, and under date of June 5 the Director of the Budget Bureau advised the Department as follows:

"You are advised that the expenditures contemplated would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President, if the proposed legislation were amended in accordance with the recommendations contained in your report, and if further amended to authorize annual appropriations for improvements, by striking out on page 8, line 21, the words 'made available', and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'authorized to be appropriated.'"

Very sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

H.R. 8349—TOBACCO WAREHOUSE BILL

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House bill 8349, known as the "tobacco warehouse bill."

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, on February 28, 1934, I introduced a bill, H.R. 8349, to regulate the sale of tobacco upon the warehouse floors scattered over several of the States of the Union. I desire to discuss the bill for a few minutes this morning in order to bring the matter to the attention of the Members of Congress, the tobacco growers, and warehousemen.

My study of the tobacco situation, and I have given considerable thought and study to the question during my service as a member of the Agriculture Committee for the past

3 years, leads me to the conclusion that the tobacco growers of our country from the time they take their tobacco to the warehouse until it is sold are absolutely at the mercy of the warehousemen and tobacco buyers. It is true that some of the States have tobacco laws regulating the marketing of tobacco, but most, if not all of these State laws, either do not go far enough or are dead letters. What we need is a uniform tobacco marketing act under Federal regulation that will be strictly and impartially enforced in every tobacco warehouse in the Union. The passage of such a law will not injure the warehousemen and buyers who are doing an honest and legitimate business and will bring untold benefits to the tobacco growers.

The only open criticism I have seen so far of the bill is that "it goes too far and does not constitute a wise step to follow the crop-reduction plan." In my opinion we need tobacco-warehouse legislation more today than ever before. We have asked the growers to reduce production, and when we do this we should certainly see that they are given every protection in marketing their tobacco so they will receive the highest price possible in order to compensate them, as far as possible, for the reduction in production.

To be perfectly frank my bill is drawn to protect the growers of tobacco and, in my opinion, will go a long way in protecting them. There is, however, nothing in the bill to which the warehousemen and buyers can take exception. If they are not guilty of the evils sought to be corrected, then, of course, the bill will not affect them. If they are guilty of these evils, then fairness and justice demands that they should be made to correct them.

In passing, I want to drop this thought: The growers had better be skeptical of the warehousemen and buyers who oppose this legislation.

TOBACCO WAREHOUSES ARE PUBLIC UTILITIES

Tobacco warehouses are public utilities and should be regulated as such. It is time that we faced the facts and protected the tobacco growers. We regulate by Federal legislation the cotton exchange, where cotton is sold; the wheat exchange where wheat is sold; the stockyards, where cattle are sold; but leave the tobacco grower at the mercy of the warehousemen and buyers.

No wonder the warehousemen and tobacco companies have grown rich. They have had good picking all these years and believe me they know how to pick. No wonder the tobacco companies, in spite of the depression, have been able to pay large salaries and show huge profits from year to year. Why, Mr. Grower, do you know that the American Tobacco Co. has been paying its president, George W. Hill, $2,500,000 per year? And, Mr. Grower, let me tell you how these huge salaries are paid and these huge profits are made. These unconscionable salaries have been paid and these enormous profits have been made by robbing the tobacco growers out of their tobacco. I know that these are harsh words, but everyone who knows anything about the tobacco business knows that they are true.

I can prove my statement by giving just one example: Take a package of cigarettes made out of burley tobacco. At 15 cents per pound for burley tobacco—and the farmers are not getting that much—the tobacco in a package of cigarettes brings the tobacco grower just 0.9 of 1 cent. The factory cost for making the package of cigarettes is 0.7 of 1 cent, the cost for selling the package 0.3 of 1 cent, and the Government tax 4 cents on the package, making a total cost of 5.9 cents. The package of cigarettes retails for 15 cents, or two packages for 25 cents, leaving a profit of from 7 to 9 cents per package. If you will only stop and figure you will find that the same is true of cigars, smoking tobacco, and chewing tobacco. Now, the above figures are not guesswork. They were compiled by Dr. Jones of the tobacco section of the Department of Agriculture.

Now take the package of cigarettes. Listen. If the buyer increased the price of burley from 15 cents to 30 cents per pound, this advance in the price of tobacco would only increase the cost of producing a package of cigarettes nine tenths of 1 cent. It is evident, therefore, that the tobacco grower could be paid 100 percent more for his tobacco without materially reducing the profits of the manufacturer and without increasing the cost to the consumer.

Now, in all fairness, I want to ask this question: Is it not about time that the profits from tobacco should be more equally distributed between the grower, the warehouseman, and the manufacturer? The consumer, for his chewing and smoking, pays a price that leaves a handsome profit. The trouble is the grower has been unable to share in the profit.

Another thing: Our present system of marketing tobacco is monopolistic. Warehouse services are governed by rules and regulations promulgated by what is known as "the board of trade." As strange as it may sound, the tobacco growers, however, while forced to use the facilities of the tobacco warehouse, if they market their crops, have no voice in promulgating the rules and regulations, that is, in fixing the charges or setting up the regulations under which their product is sold. It simply is not right. It is not fair. And it is the duty of the Government to step in and regulate this particular public utility, having for its object, as in other laws regulating public utilities, the protection of that part of the public affected, which, in this case, is the tobacco grower.

In sponsoring this legislation I am not unmindful of the fact that the warehousemen and buyers will attempt to defeat its passage. They are well organized, and many of them, through their hirelings, will put on an effective campaign of misrepresentation and deceit. I use the words "many of them" advisedly, because I know some of the warehousemen are sympathetic and will not oppose the bill. Oh, I know what is coming. I have already heard some of their insidious propaganda.

They will try in every conceivable way to create the impression that the bill is not in the interest of the growers, and that their sole object in opposing the bill is to protect the dear growers from the effects of such ill-considered legislation. Mr. Grower, you may not now suspect it, and when you remember some of your past experiences you may be a little shocked to hear it, but remember my words when I tell you that you are soon to be told that the best friends you ever had are the warehousemen and buyers.

In answer I say, "Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts."

They will tell you, Mr. Grower, that the bill goes too far.

Well, let me answer that argument: You can tell about any kind of a tale on a fellow if it is untrue. The moment you begin joking him about the truth you immediately hear the cry, "Old man, be careful, don't go too far."

They will tell you, Mr. Grower, that the bill is a radical, vicious piece of legislation.

In answer I say: If the usury laws which prohibit the charge of high and exorbitant interest rates are radical and vicious, then I admit that this bill which prohibits the charge of high and exorbitant commissions on tobacco sales is radical and vicious. If the law that prohibits an agent from acting in a dual capacity is radical and vicious, then I admit that this bill which prohibits a warehouseman from buying tobacco from a grower for his own account and then charging the grower for making the sale is radical and vicious. If the law which prohibits a merchant from short-weighting you is radical and vicious, then I will admit that this bill which prohibits the warehouseman from short-weighting the grower is radical and vicious. And if the laws against deceit, fraud, and trickery are radical and vicious, then I will admit that this bill which provides for the inspection and grading of all tobacco, thus prohibiting the fraud, deceit, and trickery that has been going on in selling tobacco of a certain grade as tobacco of a lower grade, thus robbing the grower of the higher price, is radical and vicious.

The best way, however, to find out if the bill is against the interest of the growers, if it goes too far, and if it is radical and vicious legislation, is to examine the bill. Now, let us for a few minutes dispassionately, honestly, and fairly examine the provisions of the bill.

OPENING DATE OF SALES

Under the bill the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to designate the opening sale dates for the various types of tobacco markets.

This is a wise provision. Under the present system the growers of tobacco do not have any control over when the markets will open up. While there is good reason to believe that some of the markets should be opened sooner than they have heretofore opened, without some regulation the growers are left at the mercy of the buyers on such questions, because the buyers have always decided when the markets shall be opened, notwithstanding the fact that the growers may suffer considerable loss by not being able to market their tobacco when ready for market. Again, in some instances the buyers elect to stay on a particular market only during a given period, thus compelling undue haste and inexcusable congestion in marketing. Does this provision go too far?

ORDERLY MARKETING

The bill contains many wise provisions which will insure the orderly marketing of tobacco. Under our present system growers have to wait, sometimes for days, or else take their tobacco back home, due to the fact that the warehouse floors are full. And on many of the tobacco warehouse floors the congestion is so great that the tobacco is piled around in a haphazard sort of way, no regard whatever being paid to displaying the tobacco in such a way as to reveal its true grade. Tobacco, when piled around in such a haphazard way, does not reveal its true worth, and consequently brings a lower price, in many instances, than it should.

Under the bill we would have an orderly system of marketing. The bill provides that all growers shall be accorded the same privileges and services by the warehouseman; that the warehouseman shall assign floor space in the order applications are filed, keeping a book showing all reservations of floor space; that no person shall tamper with, molest, walk on, or in any way damage tobacco while on the floor; and that the warehouseman shall provide for each basket or container in which tobacco is offered for sale a ticket, upon which shall be designated the net weight of the tobacco, and so forth.

The bill also gives the Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the specific powers enumerated above, very broad powers in making rules and regulations prescribing the method of handling tobacco.

Does this provision go too far?

If you are paying a man to serve you, is it going too far to demand that he render real and efficient service?

OVEREXPANSION

The bill provides that all warehousemen shall be licensed, and no person shall be granted a license to operate or conduct a tobacco warehouse unless such warehouse shall be found, upon investigation made by the Secretary of Agriculture, to be necessary.

The object of this provision is to keep the warehouse business from becoming overexpanded.

A casual study will convince any fair-minded man that there has been a considerable overexpansion of warehouse facilities in certain areas. The tobacco grower pays for these additional and unnecessary warehouses. Why? Simply because the warehouseman's chief source of revenue is the commissions he receives for selling the growers tobacco. If, for example, there is an overexpansion of 25 percent in warehouse facilities, this can only have one meaning and that is the tobacco growers, in order to maintain this overexpanded industry, are having to pay at least 25 percent more for selling tobacco than is justifiable. There are other evils of overexpansion, such as ruthless competition, and so forth, the expenses of which are all borne by the tobacco growers.

Surely it is not going too far in demanding that this additional burden shall not be saddled on the back of the tobacco grower.

RECORDS

The bill provides that all warehousemen shall keep books, records, and accounts, which shall fully disclose all transactions relating to the business of the warehouse, and the financial condition thereof, including the true ownership of such business, and that such records shall be open to the inspection of the Secretary of Agriculture or his duly authorized agents.

Is there anything wrong with this provision? Is not it right that the grower should know who is selling his tobacco? If the purchasers of tobacco, the great tobacco companies, are interested in the warehouse, or own the warehouse, is not the tobacco grower, who is the seller, entitled to this information? Is it going too far to provide the grower with information as to the financial responsibility of the warehouseman, who is his agent?

Moreover, because the warehouse system has come into being during the last 25 or 30 years without being under the direction of law, there is a great lack of uniformity in the method of keeping records. The Department of Agriculture is dependent upon the records kept by the warehousemen for valuable information, which it must in turn publish for the benefit of the tobacco grower. Is it unreasonable to ask that these records be kept in a proper manner?

BUYERS

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, if conditions warrant, may require all persons buying tobacco to first obtain a license; and makes it unlawful for any buyer to use any unfair, discriminatory, or deceptive practices in making his purchases; or for the buyer to conspire, combine, or agree or arrange with any other person, first, to apportion territory; second, to apportion purchases or sales of tobacco in commerce; and, third, to agree not to compete when tobacco is offered for sale.

These provisions are inserted to protect not only the growers but the warehousemen from the buyers.

There has been a feeling among the growers that the large buyers of tobacco have agreed in many cases to apportion territory; that is, the buyers get together and divide territory, with the understanding that there will be no competitive bidding in their respective territories. Many growers also believe that where more than one set of buyers are on a particular market, that in many cases they have a secret understanding to apportion purchases; that is, divide them up so that each will receive the poundage and grades desired. These practices certainly destroy competitive bidding, place the growers at the mercy of the large tobacco companies, and should be prohibited.

Moreover, everyone knows that the bully on every tobacco warehouse floor is the buyer. He dominates the board of trade and intimidates the warehouseman. In this connection let us for just a minute consider the position of the warehouseman; he is the farmer's selling agent, the farmer pays him a fee for his work, yet he is in such a position, under present warehouse conditions, that it is impossible for him to act independent of the buyers' wishes. We all know that the buyer is in a position to crucify any warehouseman and that the warehouseman is made to understand that fact.

WEIGHING TOBACCO

A great many evils have developed in connection with weighing tobacco. In some States there are no laws requiring the scales to be tested. In all States the tobacco grower is, more or less, at the mercy of the man operating the scales. And who is the man? I mean no disrespect when I tell you that he is a hireling of the warehouseman. He is selected by the warehouseman, paid by the warehouseman, and naturally if beholding to anyone is beholding to the man who furnishes his bread check. My feeling in the matter is that a weighman has a public responsibility and should be compelled to accept that responsibility. He should be a disinterested party of integrity and character beholding to neither buyer nor seller. Under our present system he may be a man of high character impressed with the public responsibility that is his, or he may be simply a hireling secured for the express purpose of certifying incorrect weights.

In some markets the usual practice is to set the scales up 5 pounds. In others 2 pounds. In other sections the custom has grown up to make all weights in multiples of five.

Now, what does the bill provide? Simply this: That no person shall weigh tobacco offered for sale in a warehouse without first receiving a Federal license; that before the warehouse is opened the scales shall be inspected and tested by a lawfully authorized inspector of weights and measures; that after the warehouse opens the scales shall be tested for accuracy each day, which test shall be made by sealed weights; that each basket, container, or truck used in weighing shall be uniform in weight, within a maximum tolerance of 1 pound, and the weight clearly posted on each basket, container, and truck; that the weighman from time to time shall make a sworn report regarding the testing of the scales and the correctness of all weights made and certified by him; and that all tobacco delivered to a warehouse for sale shall be weighed at the time it is unloaded and a receipt given designating the true owner of the tobacco and the number of pounds.

If the warehousemen have been giving honest weights they should not object to this provision. If they have not been giving honest weights, isn't it right to compel them to do so? Surely no honest warehouseman can object to this section of the bill as going too far.

GRADING

One of the most important sections in the bill is the section providing that the Secretary of Agriculture may require tobacco offered for sale in any warehouse to be first inspected, graded, and classified by a grader in accordance with standards established by the Secretary. For this service the Secretary may cause to be collected a fee of 6 cents for each 100 pounds of tobacco sold.

What does this section mean? It simply means that all tobacco growers, rich and poor alike, will get what is justly coming to them out of their tobacco crop. Take for instance the small farmer who does not follow the market closely enough to know the prices of the different grades and does not know tobacco well enough to know the value of each grade, and there is no gainsaying the fact that under our present tobacco marketing system he is imposed upon. If he gets an honest grade the small expense of 6 cents per 100 pounds will only be a fraction of the benefits he will derive.

Now, it is common knowledge that tobacco of equal grades in the growers tobacco houses by some form of magic becomes of different grades on the warehouse floor. It is a matter also of common knowledge that the same tobacco if removed from the warehouse floor and then brought back, oftentimes changes its station and rank, in a few—very few—instances to a higher grade, but in most cases to a lower grade and at a considerable loss to the farmer. It is also common knowledge that the local influence of the grower has considerable weight in determining the grade of his tobacco.

Now, my friends, these things should not be; they are not right, and it is our duty to see that they are corrected, and in correcting them I do not believe we are going too far.

No one can object to this section who is willing to give his fellow man honest and just treatment.

In this connection I want to call attention to the fact that experiments carried on by the Department of Agriculture during the past 4 years with grading systems, partly subsidized and partly paid for by the growers, have convinced the Department that a unified, honest, and fair system of grading tobacco for sale should be established.

EXCESSIVE CHARGES

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall from time to time make rules and regulations prescribing, among other things, the fees and commissions warehousemen shall charge for selling tobacco.

In some States the charges for selling tobacco are fixed by law. In others the question is left entirely to the warehousemen. Investigation shows that in some sections the charges for selling are 100 percent higher than in other sections. And, furthermore, I believe it is generally known that there has grown up a system of rebates and bonuses, which take many different forms, but all of which result in the small man being overcharged and the stronger and more favored undercharged.

Let me give you an example of these excessive charges. This is an actual case: A Virginia grower marketed his 1933 crop of 3,696 pounds and received therefor an average of 7.3 cents per pound, or, in dollars and cents, $304.45. The warehouse charges amounted to $33.45, or 10.9 percent of the gross sale value. And this charge was made in spite of the Virginia law, section 1381 of the Virginia Code, which provides that the warehouseman shall only charge the grower 8 cents per hundred pounds. In other words, if the grower in this case had paid commissions according to the Virginia statute, he would have paid the warehouseman $2.96, instead of $33.45, for selling the tobacco. Think of the warehouseman actually boosting his commission 1,100 percent over the statutory law of his State.

Mr. Grower, did you know that under our present system of marketing tobacco that it costs about three times more to sell tobacco than any other basic farm product?

Certainly the tobacco growers should be protected against excessive charges and, as far as possible, a uniform system of charges set up and enforced by the Federal authorities. And certainly the vicious system of rebates and bonuses should be abolished and all growers treated alike.

No one who believes in doing the right thing can object to this provision in the bill, or be heard to cry that it is going too far.

SPECULATION

The bill provides that the warehouseman shall not be interested in any manner, financial or otherwise, in the purchase or resale of any tobacco brought in the warehouse operated by him, and further prohibits the warehouseman from speculating in or buying tobacco against orders. There is an exception in the bill permitting the warehouseman to buy and sell for the leaf account of the warehouse in order to protect the market in the sale of the farmer's tobacco.

Most of the warehousemen, I believe, operate on a legitimate basis. Acting as brokers, they do everything in their power to obtain fair prices for the farmers, and in many instances bid against unwilling buyers and take a loss on their leaf account in order to maintain reasonable prices on the market.

On the other hand, there are a great many instances in which warehousemen in collusion with pinhookers and speculators act in the dual capacity of selling agent and buyer. The warehouseman, as the agent of the grower, is paid to represent the grower, and has no right to speculate on the tobacco he receives a commission to sell. The practice is illegal, vicious, and works to the great detriment of the grower, and it is time we put a stop to such practice.

Why, only recently I was told that a certain warehouseman in Virginia admitted that last year he made $30,000 speculating on the tobacco he received a commission to sell.

CONCLUSION

Under the new deal one of two things is going to happen: The present system of selling tobacco is going to be cleaned up as provided for in the bill I have introduced, or some similar bill, or the present system of selling tobacco is going to be destroyed. Mr. Warehouseman, I want you to get the force of that statement. In your might today you may consider the statement as only idle words, but mark what I say: Get behind this bill and help clean up the system, or defeat it and destroy your own business.

All of the growers I have heard from—and I have heard from thousands—are behind this bill. They need protection; and their agents, the warehousemen, should be in the forefront fighting for this bill in order to give them protection. And I want to say frankly that if this bill, or some similar bill that will protect the growers from the abuses of the present system, is not passed, then I am in favor of, and will fight for, some other tobacco marketing system that will insure the tobacco growers just and fair treatment in marketing their tobacco.

I know that some of the warehousemen entertain the views I have expressed, and I am glad to state that one of the warehousemen in my own district—Mr. Wells—is in sympathy with the bill.

The tobacco growers are entitled to share in the benefits of the new deal; and, by the Eternal, I am determined to see that they do.

Mr. Grower, I am waging this fight for you. It is your fight. We should win, because we are only asking for simple justice. If you want to help in this fight, and I know you do, then take the bill up immediately with your Congressman and Senators. Many of the warehousemen have been for weeks actively opposing this bill. They are organizing and are going to put up a determined fight. If we lose, it will be because the growers give up.

Mr. Grower, it is up to you.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION BY AIRCRAFT

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for the regulation of interstate transportation of passengers, mail, and property by aircraft within the United States. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred as requested.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Committee on Interstate Commerce usually has jurisdiction over measures affecting the transportation of passengers and commodities in interstate commerce. I note that the Senator asks that this bill go to the Committee on Commerce. Is there any special reason for not having it referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think on this occasion there may be. If, after reading the bill when it shall have been printed, the Senator shall then think it should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I may consider the matter with him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

The bill (S. 3187) to provide for the regulation of interstate transportation of passengers, mail, and property by aircraft within the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO REVENUE BILL—COPPER-BEARING ORES AND CONCENTRATES, ETC.

TERMS OF AUTOMOBILE-LABOR SETTLEMENT—STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the full text of President Roosevelt's statement announcing the terms of the automobile-labor settlement. I also ask that the statement be referred to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, with the prayerful hope that it will have some effect on the consideration of the so-called "Wagner bill."

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Monday, Mar. 26, 1934]

PROVISIONS OF AUTO SETTLEMENT

(Following is the text of President Roosevelt's statement announcing terms of the automobile-labor settlement and outlining the policies of the administration in the Government's relationship to labor:)

"After many days of conferring in regard to the principles of employment in the automobile industry, the following statement covers the fundamentals:

"1. Reduced to plain language, section 7a of N.R.A. means—
"(a) Employees have the right to organize into a group or groups.

"(b) When such group or groups are organized they can choose representatives by free choice, and such representatives must be received collectively and thereby seek to straighten out disputes and improve conditions of employment.

"(c) Discrimination against employees because of their labor affiliations, or for any other unfair or unjust reason, is barred.

"A settlement and statement of procedure and principles is appended hereto.

"It has been offered by me to, and has been accepted by, the representatives of the employees and employers. It lives up to the principles of collective bargaining. I hope and believe that it opens up a chance for a square deal and fair treatment. It gives promise of sound industrial relations. It provides further for a board of three, of which the chairman will, as a neutral, represent the Government.

"In actual practice details and machinery will, of course, have to be worked out on the basis of common sense and justice, but the big point is that this broad purpose can develop with a tribunal which can handle practically every problem in an equitable way.

"PRINCIPLES OF SETTLEMENT

"Settlement of the threatened automobile strike is based on the following principles:

"1. The employers agree to bargain collectively with the freely chosen representatives of groups and not to discriminate in any way against any employee on the ground of his union-labor affiliations.

"2. If there be more than one group, each bargaining committee shall have total membership pro rata to the number of men each member represents.

"3. N.R.A. to set up within 24 hours a board, responsible to the President of the United States, to sit in Detroit to pass on all questions of representation, discharge, and discrimination. Decision of the board shall be final and binding on the employer and employees. Such a board to have access to all pay rolls and to all lists of claimed employee representation, and such board will be composed of (a) a labor representative; (b) an industry representative; (c) a neutral.

"In cases where no lists of employees claiming to be represented have been disclosed to the employer, there shall be no basis for a claim of discrimination. No such disclosure in a particular case shall be made without specific direction of the President.

"4. The Government makes it clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

"5. The industry understands that in reduction or increases of force such human relationships as married men with families shall come first, and then seniority, individual skill, and efficient service. After these factors have been considered, no greater proportion of outside union employees similarly situated shall be laid off than of other employees. By outside union employees is understood a laid-up member in good standing, or anyone legally obligated to pay up. An appeal shall lie in case of dispute on principles of paragraph 5 to the board of three.

"PRAISES COOPERATION

"In all the hectic experience of N.R.A., I have not seen more earnest and patriotic devotion than has been shown by both employers and employees in the automotive industry. They sat night and day for nearly 2 weeks without a single faltering or impatience. The result is one of the most encouraging incidents of the recovery program. It is a complete answer to those critics who have asserted that managers and employees can not cooperate for the public good without domination by selfish interest.

"In the settlement there is a framework for a new structure of industrial relations—a new basis of understanding between employers and employees. I should like you to know that in the settlement just reached in the automobile industry we have charted a new course in social engineering in the United States. It is my hope that out of this will come a new realization of the opportunities of capital and labor not only to compose their differences at the conference table and to recognize their respective rights and responsibilities but also to establish a foundation on which they can cooperate in bettering the human relationships involved in any large industrial enterprise.

"It is particularly fitting that this great step forward should be taken in an industry whose employers and employees have contributed so consistently and so substantially to the industrial and economic development of this country in the last quarter century. Having pioneered in mechanical invention to a point where the whole world marvels at the perfection and economy of American motor cars and their wide-spread ownership by our citizens in every walk of life, this industry has indicated now its willingness to undertake a pioneer effort in human engineering on a basis never before attempted.

"STRESSES ADVANCES

"In the settlement just accomplished two outstanding advances have been achieved. In the first place, we have set forth a basis on which, for the first time in any large industry, a more comprehensive, a more adequate, and a more equitable system of industrial relations may be built than ever before. It is my hope that this system may develop into a kind of works council in industry in which all groups of employees, whatever may be their choice of organization or form of representation, may participate in joint conferences with their employers, and I am assured by the industry that such is also their goal and wish.

"In the second place, we have for the first time written into an industrial settlement a definite rule for the equitable handling of reductions and increases of forces. It would be ideal if employment in all occupations could be more generally stabilized, but in the absence of that much-desired situation, if we can establish a formula which gives weight to the human factors as well as the economic, social, and organizational factors in relieving the hardship of seasonal layoff, we shall have accomplished a great deal. My view, and that of both employees and employers, is that we have measurably done so in this settlement.

"This is not a one-sided statute, and organizations of employees seeking to exercise their representative rights cannot at the same time be unmindful of their responsibilities.

"Industry's obligations are clearly set forth and its responsibilities are established. It is not too much to expect organizations of employees to observe the same ethical and moral responsibilities, even though they are not specifically prescribed by the statute. Only in this way can industry and its works go forward with a united front in their assault on depression and gain for both the desired benefits of continually better times."

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make advances to the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes, and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, under rules and regulations to be promulgated by him and upon such terms as he may prescribe, to eliminate diseased dairy and beef cattle, including cattle suffering from tuberculosis or Bangs' disease, and to make payments to owners with respect thereto."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert "To amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle and other products as basic agricultural commodities, and for other purposes"; and the Senate agree to the same.

PROSPERITY AND RATE REDUCTIONS—ADDRESS BY BASIL MANLY

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on March 9, 1934, Hon. Basil Manly, Vice Chairman of the Federal Power Commission and former joint chairman with ex-President Taft of the War Labor Board, delivered before the City Club of Boston, a carefully considered and forceful address in which, in part, he stressed the value for industrial leaders and the public of mass production and distribution, with reasonably reduced rates, in the electric light and power industry. I ask unanimous consent to have this address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am here today to tell you about the work of the Federal Power Commission and its relation to the efforts of citizens in every part of the country to secure cheap and abundant electricity.

The power question has become a national issue. It directly concerns every American household and every American business. Our domestic comfort as well as our national prestige depend upon our working out a practical and constructive solution of the many problems which it involves. That is the objective of the Federal Power Commission.

Such a program is necessary because the leaders of the industry failed to discharge the public trust which had been reposed in them. They have had an almost unrestricted opportunity to serve the public and build up a sound, well-managed industrial structure. But, with rare exceptions, they have been weighed in the balances and found wanting.

For many years before the crash of 1929 the utility magnates were sitting on top of the world. Their friends were entrenched in the seats of the mighty at Washington. They were free from any effective regulation by States or the Federal Government. Their stocks and bonds had been built up into an unstable pyramid, whose sole foundation was operating-company profit. But, in spite of the insecurity of this financial structure, their securities continued to sell at fantastic prices, because of the belief of investors in the honesty and integrity of the leaders of this great public-service industry.

The press agents and propagandists, lavishly financed by the power corporations, were teaching the public, as well as the children in private and public schools, that the utilities were model corporations managed by archangels and supermen. Contributing generously to the campaign funds of both the great political parties, the financiers, promoters, and managers of the power industry felt secure against the growing opposition in both Houses of Congress and in the legislatures of widely scattered States.

Today these utilities are on trial to determine whether their responsible officers and directors now have sufficient courage, intelligence, and statesmanship to adjust their policies and methods to satisfy the demands of a public opinion that has been aroused in every section of the country.

I have no intention of reviewing here today the misdeeds of those who have wrecked great corporations, robbed the consuming public, ruined innocent investors, and sought corruptly to influence the schools, the colleges, and the public press of the Nation. The people now know the facts and are insistently demanding that the old order of things in this industry be ended forever.

It is sufficient to direct your attention to the fact that the difficulties under which the utilities are now laboring and the losses which innocent investors in their securities have suffered are the result of indefensible mismanagement, wreckage, and looting by corrupt or incompetent officials, directors, promoters, or financiers rather than the result of any policy or any punitive action on the part of the authorities of the Federal Government or those of any State.

Insull holding-company stocks and bonds are today almost worthless, not because of anything that has been done by Government officials but because Samuel Insull and his henchmen sold the public what were in effect counterfeit securities and then deliberately diverted to their own private gain the relatively small amount of real value that underlay them. And Insull's best defense, which is no defense in either law or ethics, is that he did only what other leaders of this great industry were doing.

It is true that public-utility securities are now depressed, but that is not due to Government competition in the Tennessee Valley or at Boulder Dam, or to any other policy of the Roosevelt administration, as the utility propagandists are seeking to make the public believe. The best proof of this is the fact that the price index of public-utility securities, as reported by the Wall Street Journal, reached its lowest level of 16.35 in July 1932, when Herbert Hoover was President of the United States. Now the public-utility-security index stands at about 26.50, representing an increase of 62 percent above the level at which it stood when Franklin Roosevelt was nominated.

The worst damage now being done to investors in utility stocks and bonds is coming from the calamity howlers of Wall Street, who are shouting from the housetops that the industry is being wrecked by the Federal Government's program for the development of great water-power resources, that would otherwise be running to waste, and by the efforts of the State commissions to reduce excessive rates for electric light and power.

These prophets of destruction are pursuing the same mad course in relation to the utilities that they followed for a generation with respect to the railroads. Resisting every public effort to secure lower railroad rates, to modernize equipment, to regulate securities in the interest of a sound financial structure, and to place the valuation of railroad properties on a basis of actual prudent investment, they so loaded the rail carriers down with high freight and passenger rates, excessive capitalization, and obsolete equipment that they were unable to meet the competition of buses, trucks, airplanes, and waterways. Today progressive railroad executives, under the inspiration and leadership of one of the ablest citizens of Massachusetts, Hon. Joseph B. Eastman, Federal Coordinator of Transportation, are cutting freight and passenger rates, installing modern high-speed equipment, and providing house-to-house freight delivery. These progressive policies are already building up freight and passenger traffic and restoring their railroads to a sound competitive basis.

The leaders of the electric utility industry in the present crisis have an exceptional opportunity to display industrial statesmanship and check the rising tide of public hostility and suspicion which the policies and events of recent years have directed against them. They can, if they choose, place the industry on a sounder and more enduring financial basis than it has ever enjoyed since Thomas A. Edison opened the Pearl Street station some 40 years ago. They are in control of an industry that is sound and relatively efficient from an operating standpoint. To succeed they must rebuild its financial structure and revolutionize its public policies.

First of all, they must immediately and voluntarily revise the rate structure for residential and small commercial consumers so as to give home owners and storekeepers cheaper rates and more desirable service. They must provide rates that will promote rather than discourage the use of electricity through the score of appliances that science has developed to lighten household burdens and increase domestic joys. The utilities will inevitably be repaid by an increase in the use of electric current that will not only expand the volume of business but materially straighten out the load curve and thus reduce unit costs of operation.

After they have taken this initial step of promotional rate reduction they must keep on reducing rates from time to time in progressive steps until a rate structure approximating that of the Tennessee Valley Authority has been put into effect throughout the length and breadth of the land. In pursuing this policy of progressive rate reduction they will not only bring back the sunshine of public favor which they once enjoyed but they will put their companies in a sounder and more stable financial position than they have ever enjoyed.

This apparent paradox of securing larger and steadier profits by reducing residential and small commercial rates arises out of two fundamental principles, which every intelligent utility operator knows but which have never been understood by the bankers and financiers who control the industry and determine its policies.

The first of these principles is that there is no industry in which the expansion of mass production and mass distribution yields such handsome returns as in the electric light and power industry. The reason is so simple that even a child can understand it. After the distribution system is in place for a house or a store, every kilowatt-hour of energy sold to a customer over and above the amount necessary to cover fixed charges, maintenance, and commercial expense costs a utility nothing more than the bare operating expense. Even if you have an old, high-cost generating plant, in which your bare operating costs run as high as 6 or 7 mills, you can make money by inducing customers to use more current at 2 cents a kilowatt-hour after your basic costs have been provided for in the earlier steps of a promotional schedule. But if you have a really modern, low-cost plant, in which operating costs are 2 mills or less, the profit possibilities that flow from increasing the consumption of electricity are tremendous.

The second principle, which has been abundantly demonstrated during the depression, is that the business of supplying residential and small commercial consumers is, year in and year out, the steadiest that any utility can have. When a business slump comes, the industrial electric load fades away like the proverbial snowball in Hades. But no matter how hard the times, homes must be lighted, dinners must be cooked, and stores must display their wares.

It follows from these two principles that those utilities will be most enduringly prosperous which bend their energies to building up their domestic and commercial business to a high level of consumption and a high load factor through a policy of progressive rate reductions.

In support of the validity of these principles, I might cite the experience of many municipal plants, both in the United States and Canada, which have progressively reduced rates to very low levels with satisfactory financial results. I prefer, however, to describe the results achieved by a privately owned company located in the Nation's Capital which is some 200 miles from the source of its fuel supply and has almost no industrial load to boost its plant-capacity factor.

Ten years ago, after a period of endless litigation which had exasperated public opinion in Washington, the Potomac Electric Co. entered into a contract with the Public Service Commission of the District by which it agreed to reduce rates each year by an amount representing one half of its surplus earnings over and above 7½ percent on an agreed valuation of its property. For convenience, we will call this the "Washington plan." At that time the rate charged for domestic service was 10 cents a kilowatt-hour. In the first year, under this plan, rate reductions amounting to $762,000 were made. The domestic rate was cut to 7½ cents.

The board of directors of this company, like those of every other utility with which I am acquainted, naturally expected that this would be the end of rate reductions, because it was impossible for them to conceive that there would be any profit at all, much less a surplus, after a 25-percent rate cut. But the principles which I have enunciated came into play, the people used more electricity, and each year a substantial surplus was piled up to be applied to rate reductions.

Every year for 10 years there has been a substantial rate reduction for the people of Washington, until today they have a rate schedule which approaches that announced by the Tennessee Valley Authority. They pay 8.9 cents for the first 50 kilowatt-hours, 3.3 cents for the next 50 kilowatt-hours, 2 cents for the next 100 kilowatt-hours, and 1.5 cents for everything over 200 kilowatt-hours. I use electricity in my home for lighting, cooking, refrigeration—in fact, everything except heating—and my bill for a 12-room house averages less than $8 a month.

Now, what has happened to the poor utility company while this ruinous and unending series of rate reduction has been taking place? Get out your handkerchiefs and prepare to weep for the widows and orphans and other innocent investors who had put their savings in the bonds or preferred stock of this oppressed company. They couldn't buy its common stock because that was all held by the street-railway company.

In 1924, before this terrible rate-reduction policy went into effect, the company earned three and four tenths times its bond interest, after allowance for depreciation and taxes. That made it a fairly sound investment; but in 1932, after 8 years of rate reductions, and with rates less than a third what they were in 1925, the company earned 12 times its bond interest. At the same time the earnings on the common stock, which is tightly held by the street-railway company, have advanced under this policy of progressive rate reduction from $26.90 in 1924 to $68.08 in 1932.

These spectacular financial results, I want you to understand, have been achieved under a voluntary agreement and substantially without litigation, except for the proceedings relating to the recent successful move of the Public Service Commission to secure a more generous provision for continued rate reductions. This freedom from litigation and the complete elimination of the valuation controversy are, in my opinion, two of the most valuable features of the "Washington plan", because they not only remove an incentive for inefficiency and padding capital accounts, but give the responsible operating officials a chance to attend to business and improve service instead of spending their time seeking to circumvent commissions and influence legislatures.

Before leaving this case of the electric rates in the Nation's Capital, I want to point out one other feature that is most impressive and which may perhaps penetrate even a Wall Street banker's intelligence. In 1924, when the domestic rate was 10 cents a kilowatt-hour, 25 cents out of every dollar of gross revenue taken in by the company was available for dividends, after the payment of interest, taxes, depreciation, and all expenses. In 1932, when the domestic schedule had been cut to a maximum of 3.9 cents, the balance available for dividends amounted to 40 cents out of every dollar of gross revenue. These facts and figures seem to demonstrate not only that this company has not been ruined by rate reductions but that it can, if it will, meet the Tennessee Valley rate schedule and, if necessary, go it one better.

This is true, I firmly believe, of every soundly financed and well-managed operating company that is not being bled by holding company or other parasitical affiliations. This view finds support in the recently expressed opinions of some of the more progressive leaders of the industry. Samuel Ferguson, of Hartford, Conn., one of the few utility executives who had the sanity and courage to stand out against the holding-company mania, recently said:

"Our ultimate goal is the complete electrification of every home with the use therein of from 300 to 600 kilowatt-hours per month for light, cooking, heating, refrigeration, hot water, and other uses. Recently the T.V.A., backed by the resources of the Federal Government, has avowed its intention of achieving a similar goal and it has been inferred that privately owned companies would suffer by comparison. Your company welcomes this challenge to match Yankee dollars and ingenuity against taxpayer dollars and the efficiency of governmental bodies." (From the Electrical World, Mar. 3, 1934, p. 319.)

If other utility executives and bankers will quit whining and show the same courage and business acumen, investors will have little to fear from public competition.

I have taken a long time to reach the question of the policy and activities of the Federal Power Commission, but I have felt that it was necessary first to lay before you the necessity for a national power program and to show you why I believe that the policy of securing for the people cheaper and more abundant electricity, which President Roosevelt has proclaimed, will not destroy the privately owned utilities, but that, if they will themselves adopt sound progressive policies, they will enter upon a period of enduring prosperity, such as could never have been attained under the leadership of the Insults and other plunderers who threatened the very existence of the industry.

The fundamental power policy of the Federal Power Commission and of President Roosevelt, as stated most fully in his Portland speech, is very simple. It avoids alike the extreme of State socialism on the one hand and economic anarchism on the other. It does not go along with those who demand Nation-wide public ownership and operation of the generation, transmission, and distribution of electricity. It refuses likewise to be misled by those anarchistic captains of industry who, while accepting the benefits that flow to them from the operation of a publicly regulated monopoly, resort to every device to escape regulation so that they may follow their own individualistic and destructive policies.

Because of the policy pursued by the Federal Power Commission during the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations, it has been generally assumed that the sole function and authority of the Commission is to supervise the development of the Nation's water-power resources by private interests. That is a complete misconception of the intent of Congress as embodied in the Federal Water Power Act of 1920. That act clearly contemplated not only the formulation of a national power program after a thorough survey of the Nation's power resources but specifically provided that the Commission should submit recommendations to Congress whenever it deemed that any project should be developed by the Federal Government itself. The debates in Congress when this act was under consideration demonstrate that it was intended that the Nation's power resources should be developed not solely for the profit of private corporations but primarily for the benefit of domestic, rural, and industrial consumers.

The present membership of the Federal Power Commission, with the approval of the President, is seeking earnestly to make this policy effective. Under the terms of the act it is proceeding as rapidly as possible to determine the actual legitimate cost of the projects developed by its licensees, so that this information may be available to State commissions and other regulatory bodies in fixing the rates to be charged for electricity generated from these resources. This involves not only careful ascertainment of the actual cost of the work but the elimination of excessive fees and charges imposed upon the project by holding companies and affiliated construction corporations. The aggregate cost of the projects before the Commission, as claimed by the licensees, amounts to approximately a billion dollars, and you will readily understand that a huge task is involved merely in the determination of the amount that should be allowed as the actual legitimate cost.

The Federal Water Power Act also conferred upon the Commission important regulatory powers which have been largely in abeyance for many years, but which the present membership of the Commission proposes to exercise in accordance with the authority provided by law.

The act also empowered the Commission to make a survey of the Nation's water-power resources and to classify the power sites in their relation to available markets. The obvious purpose of this authorization was to secure the necessary data for the formulation of a national power policy, so that, if the Government should decide upon the public development of any of the Nation's power resources, those sites would be chosen which could be most cheaply developed and were most advantageously located in relation to available markets. This very important duty should have been performed years ago, but the Commission, as then constituted, did not have the funds for such a survey and did not choose to ask that they be provided by Congress. If this survey had been made, the program of the Public Works Administration would have been greatly accelerated. The Administration would have known exactly which power sites could be most advantageously developed and would have had available preliminary plans for their construction.

In order to remedy this failure to carry out the clear intent of Congress and further to provide for the correlation of the Government's activities in relation to the development of water power, President Roosevelt, under date of August 19, 1933, directed the Federal Power Commission to make a survey of the Nation's power resources and to examine and report upon applications for loans for the construction of power projects submitted to the Public Works Administration by States and municipalities.

The national power survey thus provided for is not an academic study. It is a practical undertaking of the greatest urgency. Since the crash of 1929 few new power projects have been constructed by private industry. As a result it is estimated by the Electrical World, the official organ of the utility industry, that when industrial activity is resumed on a normal basis the existing power capacity of the country will be 2,700,000 kilowatts short of supplying the demand. These estimates are more conservative than those independently arrived at by the General Electric Co., whose engineers estimate the shortage in 1935 at 4,200,000 kilowatts. To supply this capacity would require the development of a hundred large steam-electric or hydroelectric plants, the construction of each of which would require many months of labor, even if complete plans and specifications were available.

The seriousness of this situation is accentuated by review of the emergency which confronted the United States during the World War. At that time the Nation relied wholly upon the initiative of the public-utility corporations to supply the electrical energy which would be required to meet the Nation's needs. For nearly 3 years before we entered the conflict it was clear that we might be drawn in, but no adequate steps were taken to prepare for such an emergency. When war was declared and the industries of the United States were called on to produce to their utmost capacity, the electrical resources were entirely inadequate. Only by hasty interconnection of hitherto unrelated generating districts and the adoption of other expedients was the crisis met.

Intelligent national planning, for which this administration stands, requires that this situation be considered from the standpoint of the welfare of the whole country rather than the immediate interests of private corporations. With war clouds hovering over both Europe and Asia, it is imperative that effective steps be taken to insure an adequate supply of electric power under any conditions that may reasonably be contemplated.

The essential purpose of the National Power Survey is to determine the Nation's power requirements and ascertain the sources from which they can most economically and advantageously be supplied. It is not aimed exclusively at the development of water-power sites but contemplates the establishment and maintenance of that balance between hydroelectric power and steam-electric power which will give the Nation the most dependable sources of energy at the lowest possible rates.

Examination by the Federal Power Commission of those projects for power development submitted to the Public Works Administration as a basis for Federal loans is closely related to the development of such a national power policy. It is essential that the projects which are to be financed by Federal funds should be economically feasible and properly adapted to meet the Nation's needs for additional supplies of electrical energy. It is from this broad national standpoint that the Federal Power Commission has not hesitated to submit unfavorable recommendations on projects which it did not believe could be economically successful or which it did not conceive to be properly related to a well-balanced national plan.

Closely correlated with this basic idea of a national plan for the development of the Nation's power resources is that of securing the distribution of this power to the public at fair and reasonable rates. During the last session of Congress the Senate directed the Federal Power Commission to make a study of the cost of distribution of electrical energy in relation to the costs of generation and transmission. This investigation is now under way and when completed will afford a scientific basis for testing the reasonableness of the rates charged for electricity in all classes of service and under the varying conditions of widely diversified communities.

There is now pending before the House of Representatives, after having passed the Senate, a resolution, jointly introduced by Senator Norris, of Nebraska, and Representative RANKIN, of Mississippi, authorizing the Federal Power Commission to make an official compilation of electric rates in every community in the United States. The only published information now available with regard to electric rates is the rate book of the Edison Electric Institute, the successor of the National Electric Light Association. This publication, however, covers only 473 communities or less than 3 percent of all those served with electric power. It contains no information regarding charges for electric service in small communities which are notoriously subjected to excessive and unreasonable rates. I have recently examined a partial compilation of the rates charged small communities in one of the Western States, in which the charges ranged as high as 20 cents and 25 cents per kilowatt-hour. I know personally of communities in the South, located within a few miles of hydroelectric power plants, where the costs are only a few mills a kilowatt-hour, which are paying 12 cents and 15 cents for their electricity.

Not only are the rates in many of these communities obviously excessive but the rate schedules themselves are so complicated that it would require a combination of Einstein and a Philadelphia lawyer to understand them. A recent investigation by one of the large utility companies, which is intelligently attempting to revise its rates to meet present-day standards, disclosed more than 800 separate and distinct electric rate schedules in effect in the territory which it serves in a part of two Middle Western States.

This investigation of electric rates will, I believe, be of the greatest value to the State commissions in their regulation of local rates but it will also benefit the private utility companies in enabling them to work out a rate structure which will be profitable to themselves and highly advantageous to domestic, rural, and small commercial consumers.

For many years the privately owned utilities have mapped out their own course without substantial restraint from any Federal or State authority. This course has been marked by the wreckage of great corporate systems, by the sale of securities which had no substantial value to innocent investors, employees, and consumers, by the imposition of excessive rates which discouraged the use of electricity, and by an attempt to corrupt and control public opinion, which the people of these United States will not tolerate.

We are now embarking upon a new era in which the utility corporations can, if they will, establish for themselves a sounder and more enduring basis of financial prosperity, but in which their performance in terms of rates and service will be measured by the yardstick of public competition, so far as is necessary to insure the supply of electricity required for national development and security and the sale of that electricity at rates which will be fair and reasonable to domestic, rural, and industrial consumers.

PLATFORM OF THE HEARST NEWSPAPERS

MR. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an editorial from today's Washington Herald, which lays down an excellent Republican platform with which to meet the onslaught of Hitlerism, fascism, and bolshevism in 1934 and 1936. Around this platform should gather the Jeffersonian Democrats and the Lincoln Republicans whose phalanx should far outnumber the present conglomeration of demagogues, State Socialists, Communists, Bolsheviks, and international propagandists with their poisonous doctrines being taught in our schools and all the other "ists", "iks", or "ogues" that now constitute the Democratic Party.

Our virile advocacy and defense of the independence lived and expressed by Jefferson, the father of the Democratic Party, and the identical principles of Abraham Lincoln, founder of the Republican Party, will bring us back to mature leadership, sanity, and constitutional government.

If the purpose of this administration, which may be described as one where "a little child shall lead us", has been, as Dr. Wirt, of Gary, Ind., thinks, to bring us to destruction, turmoil, riot, and revolution, it has been an undeniable success. In July 1933, without the aid of insane doctrines, wheat was bringing $1.20 a bushel; flax, oats, rye, barley, butter, and everything else were in proportion, and recovery would have been inevitable. After 30 days of the N.R.A.—the National Racketeers Association—wheat fell to 85 cents and everything else in proportion.

Building contracts right here in Washington for July 1933 amounted to $990,000; in 30 days under the "national ruin act" they fell to $52,000, and they have been falling ever since. Similar things happened all over the country. No wonder Dr. Wirt says this administration does not want recovery but is purposely planning for consternation, strikes, and turmoil in order that the Government may, through the bewilderment of the people, take over the sovereign power of the people and translate it into a permanent dictatorship through some Stalin, Hitler, or Mussolini.

Instead of the slogan "Roosevelt or destruction" it should read "Roosevelt and destruction."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Mar. 26, 1934]

THE POSITION OF THE HEARST NEWSPAPERS

For the benefit of uninformed Congressmen, it may be stated that the Hearst papers have increased wages and shortened hours in full accordance with every request and requirement of the N.R.A. But the Hearst papers have gone further, and made increases in wages and decreases in hours in departments which the rules and regulations of the N.R.A. do not affect.

This seemed an equitable thing to do; and although the Hearst papers were not required to do it nor even requested to do it, they have made that voluntary and unsolicited contribution toward the plan and purpose of the N.R.A. recovery program.

Second, the Hearst papers, truly enough, are not altogether Democratic, but neither is the Democratic Party.

Indeed, so far has the Democratic Party of today departed from the principles of its great founder that Thomas Jefferson has been sympathetically referred to as "the forgotten man."

The so-called "Democratic Party" of the present day is a conglomerate party, a composite party, a mixed and mongrel party.

It contains some Democrats and more demagogues, some State Socialists, some Communists, and a sprinkling of Bolsheviks.

The party is mainly a party of malcontents; and if there are any "ists", "iks", or "ogues" in existence not included in the above list of fanatic and fantastic theorists, they doubtless, nevertheless, enjoy adequate representation in the hybrid Democratic Party and find sufficient bond of unity in envious opposition to anybody who possesses anything or who has accomplished anything.

No; the Hearst papers are not Democratic in the narrow party sense, nor again are they Republican.

In fact, they are not party organs of any kind.

They believe in the independence which Jefferson expressed in the great declaration of human rights and liberties which he conceived and which the valor of our fathers wrought into a living force to inspire our people and regenerate the world.

They believe in government by the Constitution of the United States and under the guarantees of liberty and opportunity and impartial justice which that instrument contains.

They do not believe in any radical departure from the spirit of the Constitution.

They do not believe in limitations upon liberty, restrictions upon opportunity, modifications or qualifications of essential justice and equality before the law.

They do not believe in any invasion of the inherent or inherited rights of the free citizens of this Republic.

They believe in American institutions and in the American system of government, which have been tried and proven by the power and by the progress and by the peacefulness and happiness and by the splendid success of this greatest of all nations upon the face of God's globe.

They do not believe in appropriating fragments of impractical policy picked up from the political scrap heaps of alien nations less free, less fortunate, less progressive, and less successful than our own.

They do not believe in so-called "innovations" which are actually as old as the history of human failure.

The Hearst papers believe in the elemental principles of Thomas Jefferson, founder of the Democratic Party, and in the almost identical principles of Abraham Lincoln, disciple of Jefferson and founder of the Republican Party; and the Hearst papers hold as their guiding policy in the honorable practice of the profession of independent journalism Lincoln's injunction to support any man when he is right and oppose him when he is wrong.

If that be party treason, make the most of it.

It is at least loyalty to the best interests of the Nation.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

MR. BYRNES. Mr. President, on last Friday the Senate temporarily laid aside further action on the independent offices appropriation bill, at which time there was pending a motion, which I offered, that the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 22, and further insist upon its amendment numbered 23. I desire to withdraw that motion. I understand the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] wishes to make a motion to concur in House amendment numbered 14. The Senator from Nevada is now in the chamber, and if he desires to make the motion to concur, I yield to him for that purpose.

MR. McCARRAN and MR. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

MR. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me for a privileged matter?

MR. BYRNES. I yield first to the Senator from Nevada; I ask the Senator from Arizona that he kindly wait. The matter now pending is also privileged.

MR. ASHURST. Very well. I am glad to defer the matter I have in mind.

MR. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in reference to the independent offices appropriation bill, and as to amendment numbered 14, which is generally known and understood as the "pay restoration" amendment, I now move, sir, that the Senate concur in the House amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, with reference to the motion of the Senator from Nevada, I desire to say that the House amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 14 is the identical amendment which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations and later was acted upon in the Senate. I drafted the amendment originally, in the hope that it would bring together the varying views upon this question. The House has three times voted upon it. It is my hope that it will be disposed of on the floor of the Senate. If, however, the motion to concur shall not be agreed to, then, it is my purpose to move that the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the House amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 14. In order that the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate may know the views of the Senate, and know how they may best represent the sentiment of the Senate, I ask for a roll call upon the question of concurring in the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 14.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in presenting this motion in order that my position may be thoroughly understood by those who supported the Senate amendment and also that their position may be thoroughly understood, let me say that I have not relinquished my idea that the best way to support the recovery of the Nation is to give to the laboring classes of the Nation the wherewithal with which to live. Inasmuch as the administration now in control of the Government has asked private industry of every class to increase wages and increase employment, I believed that it was for the best, and I still believe that it is for the best, that the greatest employer of labor in the country should set the example which it sought to have others follow and should put the Federal employees back on a reasonable wage-scale basis, such as they were on before the Economy Act came into existence. I still contend that even putting Federal labor back where it was before the Economy Act went into effect would not enable the employees to meet the increased cost of living which has come about since that act went into effect and since the new deal began to operate.

But, Mr. President, three times the House has voted on the amendment. The House of Representatives represents the people of the country. Three times by record vote they have gone on record as to the amendment. Three times they have failed to adopt the Senate amendment. In view of all the circumstances, I believe, as I have always believed, that discretion is the better part of valor and that two thirds of a loaf is better than no bread.

The laboring class of America want bread today. They want a living and they should have it. By the Senate amendment we have at least made progress toward the ultimate end we desire to attain—the restoration of a proper pay and compensation for the laborers of the country. By a restoration of 5 percent as of February 1 and a restoration of 5 percent more as of July 1, with the possibility and prevailing hope, as I hold it, that the Executive under the House amendment will see fit to restore the entire 15 percent within the proper time, I am willing to yield in order that those for whom we struggle here may have at least some benefit immediately. In the belief that such benefit will be afforded and in a spirit of fair play and hopefulness that those for whom we struggled will receive the greatest possible advantage within the shortest length of time, I have submitted the motion which I hope will prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it seems most amazing to me that the administration should insist that employers in industry all over the United States should raise wages and place additional people on the pay roll, and at the same time the same administration should want to grind the Federal employees down to the lowest possible penny.

Of course, I agree with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] on the proposition that two thirds of a loaf is better than no loaf at all. It may be possible that two thirds of restoration is all that can be gained for the Federal employees at this time. Nevertheless, Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment ought to have gone back to the House and that the Senate should have stood its ground, insisting to the last on full restoration not later than July 1.

The administration is spending billions of dollars without any coordinated audit of any kind. The truth of it is that nobody knows how many people are employed on any of the emergency rolls. But two groups apparently are discriminated against constantly by the administration, one the Federal employees of the United States, and the other the veterans of the United States. Personally, I should much rather have seen the Senate insist on its own amendments to the bill and refuse to make any further concessions whatever to the House.

So far as my own vote is concerned, I shall not yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator understand that my motion applies only to the amendment numbered 14, which has to do only with the restoration of pay, and does not relate to the veterans matter at all?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I understand that. I understand that the amendment dealing with veterans stands on its own bottom; but my own position is that the Senate should insist on its amendment and should insist on complete restoration of pay for Federal employees.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I wish to make the further suggestion that neither the Senate nor the House has done anything to restore the morale of the Federal employees, because the administration is still imposing upon them all the hobbles with reference to promotions that are automatic and promotions that are administrative. The administration still is preventing the filling of vacancies which would give an employee encouragement. In other words, the administration is doing everything possible against the employee's being encouraged to be an efficient and effective public servant.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course, there is no question about that. The other inconsistency that is inexplicable to me is the demand on the part of the administration that private business enterprises shall raise wages and add additional employees to their pay rolls—and we are all heartily in favor of that wherever it is possible to have it done—while at the same time taking just the opposite attitude toward Government employees.

Mr. DICKINSON. What kind of an eagle does the Senator think a Government employee ought to wear on the lapel of his coat under existing circumstances?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is an interesting question.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, because of the statement with reference to the attitude of the administration in this matter, I only want to say that the amendment which I offered in the Committee on Appropriations and which now is the House amendment was drafted by me after consulting only two members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. I advised the members of the subcommittee and advised the members of the full committee that it represented my views and only my views.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island

[Mr. METCALF]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote on this question. Therefore, being at liberty to vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have been requested to announce that if the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. FESS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate Chamber; but I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I have voted. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the negative). I understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has not yet voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has not voted.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have a general pair with that Senator, and I shall therefore have to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CUTTING. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably detained. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McADOO (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. When I voted a moment ago I was under the impression that he was present. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are attending an important meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor. If present, these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent attending a funeral.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] has a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS].

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is detained at a meeting of the National Forest Reservation Commission.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] is also detained in committee.

I also desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 19, as follows:

So Mr. McCARRAN's motion that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 14 was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22. This amendment comprises the veterans' provision.

I do not intend to discuss this subject, because it has been discussed approximately from February 1, when this bill was first before the Senate Appropriations Committee. It has been discussed in the other House and that body three times has voted upon it. Over the week-end I have read the debates in the House, and I have informally discussed the matter with the managers on the part of the House. They take the position, the House having voted three times, that they are bound by the action of the House, and do not intend to recede in any measure from the House provision.

The Senate has not voted upon the question, and I desire the Senate to act upon it, because, as one of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, if the Senate does not wish to concur, and determines that the conferees shall further insist upon the action of the Senate disagreeing to the House amendment, then when we go into conference I am going to stand by the action of the Senate and insist upon its position with reference to this title of the bill. If, on the other hand, the Senate shall concur in the amendment of the House to Senate amendment numbered 22, as it has been three times voted upon by the House, then the appropriation bill will be passed and will go to the White House.

As I say, the question has been before this body and before the other House since February 1. I am anxious to have it disposed of one way or the other. So far as the conferees are concerned, all we wish to know is what the Senate wants to have done with this part of the bill. If the Senate desires to concur in the action of the House, it can vote in favor of the motion to concur. If it does not desire to concur, and wishes the managers on the part of the Senate to continue the deadlock, I want the Senate, by roll call, to say so, and the conferees will do just what the Senate desires.

Mr. CUTTING and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico. Then I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I was wondering whether there was not some other alternative besides the two mentioned by the Senator. Is it necessary for one House to yield in toto to the other, or else to maintain its own position indefinitely? Is not the idea of a conference that when the conferees representing the two Houses get together around the conference table and try to iron out the difficulties, they give and take on questions on which they can give and take? Is not that still possible?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes, Mr. President, the conferees have endeavored to do that. I will say to the Senator from New Mexico, however, that when the conferees on the part of the Senate on the independent offices bill at the last session of Congress receded and so reported to this body, the Senator from New Mexico rather severely criticized them for receding from the position taken by the Senate. Further, when the conferees were appointed upon this bill at this session, the Senator from New Mexico called the attention of the Chair to the statement in the Manual on Conferences with regard to the representation of the majority view. I was simply expressing my own personal opinion that if the amendment shall be sent back to conference—where we have already tried as diligently as any conferees could to bring about an agreement—with a vote of the Senate insisting further upon its position, it will be practically impossible to secure an agreement.

Mr. President, the conferees on the part of the Senate did their best to bring about an agreement. In and out of the conference room I certainly have done everything in my power to bring about an agreement upon these controversial legislative proposals and have been doing so since the 1st of February. But now I admit that in recent weeks I have often heard managers on the part of the Senate criticized because the Senate conferees had receded, and I am frank to say that I want the Senate to vote and make known its wishes, and by the vote the managers on the part of the Senate will be guided.

Personally, I hope the Senate will concur. The amendment of the House does not represent my views at all. Nevertheless, I believe this bill should be disposed of, and since I do so believe, and because the House has three times voted upon the amendment and its conferees take the position that they are bound by that action of the House and are not going to recede, I am moving that the Senate concur. I hope the Senate will concur and that the bill will be disposed of.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know that the House, on its last vote, actually voted to accept the Senate amendment, but that the announcement of the vote was delayed for a considerable time—I know this because I was present—and finally one Representative was induced to switch?

Mr. BYRNES. No; the Senator is wrong. I will state to the Senator what did happen. When the conference met I told the conferees representing the Senate that having behind me a vote in the Senate of 65 to 15, it was useless to talk to us about receding; that they would have to go back to the House; that the Representative to whom the Senator from Pennsylvania has referred might again change his mind. They went back to the House, and by a majority of some fifty or sixty the House reiterated the position it had previously taken, and the conferees on the part of the House now say what the Representative from New York, the author of the amendment in dispute [Mr. TABER], said that he could not recall any previous occasion when the House or the Senate had three times voted and gone on record in favor of a proposal when the other House had not voted at all.

Mr. REED. It was evidently the second vote to which I was referring.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator is referring to that vote, and was confused as to the votes. I took the same view the Senator from Pennsylvania entertains, and because of that the House again voted upon the matter.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ASHURST. Members of the Senate may not discuss or refer in debate to what took place in another branch of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unaware of any Senate rule to that effect.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that certainly would be a novel rule. We may not reflect disparagingly upon proceedings in the other House.

Mr. BYRNES. There has never been any other rule I have heard of in either House of Congress, and I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree that stating the fact that a Representative demanded a roll call is not reflecting upon his character in any way.

Mr. REED. Of course, I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Because the Senator sought to state my position a moment ago, I should like to make it plain. On another occasion I did criticize the members of a Senate conference committee for receding completely to the position of the House, and I could have done so in this case, I am free to say to the Senator. But I also criticize members of a conference committee who insist unreasonably on the position of their own body so long as there is a chance of getting an agreement. I have felt, both in this matter and in others, that it might have been possible to obtain an agreement, say, about midway between the position of the Senate and the position of the House. That is what I had hoped would happen. Of course, I admit that we are now faced with a peculiar situation, and perhaps it may be necessary to adopt the course of action which the Senator approves.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, on a former occasion the Senator criticized me, as a manager on the part of the Senate, for receding, and the Senator now frankly admits that, had we insisted, he might possibly have criticized us again. I do not want the Senator to criticize me, I do not like to have him criticize me. But I may be criticized whatever I do. I receded the last time, and he criticized me; and this time I agree, and he criticized me. I want to please him.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from South Carolina give some detailed explanation of the differences between the two Houses in this matter. They are not clear to me.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do hope the Senator will not insist on that, because if there is anything that has been discussed and written about in the newspapers morning, afternoon, and evening, it is the difference between these proposals. I am sure the Senator from Colorado is familiar with the Spanish-American War proposal in the House, and the one the Senate adopted, and also the provision as to presumptives adopted by the Senate and by the House. I hope the Senator will not ask me to go into that, because it would consume too long a time. I ask for a vote.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate with respect to this matter; I lean toward concurrence, although I had hoped that the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina on last Friday or Saturday, to insist upon the Senate's position and to ask for a further conference, would prevail, in the thought that one more effort by the conferees might, in possibility, produce some result more favorable to the position of the Senate than an absolute concurrence. I am being told, however, by Representatives, just as we are told by the Senator from South Carolina, that there is little hope of any accomplishment in conference.

There is one matter to which I call attention. If we are to dispose of this question by voting upon the pending motion to concur, rather than upon the other motion, to send the amendment back to conference, we should consider that the House, in amending the Senate amendment, introduced some little obscurity, and possible inconsistent provisions, in the amendment. That can well be handled by an amendment, and I have had legislative counsel prepare an amendment, and very shortly I will offer it for the consideration of the Senate.

Before I do that, let me state to the Senate that the thing in controversy between the House and the Senate, so far as amendment no. 22 is concerned, is chiefly the difference between 75 percent restoration for certain World War veterans, as passed by the House, and 100 percent restoration as provided by the Senate amendment; and 75 percent restoration in the House provision, as against 90 percent in the Senate, for Spanish-American War veterans. Those are the money differences which affect the big groups.

In addition to that, there were some matters of lesser importance in the Senate amendments which were stricken from the bill by the House. One was a provision restoring a limited number of the emergency retired officers.

Another was a provision which increased the pensions of the widows and dependents of those lost upon the Akron and the Shenandoah.

Another amendment made by the House was in striking from the Senate language the Borah amendment, affecting the pay of Members of Congress, and of all those whose salaries are in excess of $6,000 a year.

Those are the principal changes made in the House to the Senate amendments to the House bill.

I want at this time to send to the desk the following amendment, which I offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon offers a preferential motion to concur with an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In section 27 strike out the second proviso.

In section 28 of said amendment strike out the second proviso in the fourth paragraph of section 20 of Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by such section, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided further, That, subject to the limitations above prescribed, except as to receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, and notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or any other law, veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is established on or after this paragraph as amended takes effect as service connected in accordance with the provisions of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, shall be entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the provisions of such act, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933; but veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is reestablished as service connected under such section 200 by section 27 of title III of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, shall be paid 75 percent of the compensation under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and such rating schedule."

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I ask the attention of Senators for 2 or 3 minutes. I think in that time I can explain the necessity for the amendment.

Those who listened to the reading of the amendment will see that it does not change the percentages. The amendment does not reflect an effort to increase the rate of restoration, upon which the House is insisting. Indeed, it accepts that rate. It therefore will not cost any additional money or increase the cost of the provisions to which the House has already agreed.

The necessity for the amendment grows out of the fact that in the whole amendment which we called the "Byrnes amendment" for convenience while the bill was before the Senate, there are a number of different sections. Among the sections are three that were taken out of the Legion's four-point program, with some slight modification. Two of those three sections became sections 27 and 28 of the bill.

Section 27 deals with entitlement and restores certain World War veterans, chiefly those belonging to the so-called "presumptive group", to the service-connected status enjoyed prior to March 20, 1933.

Section 28 is a protective section. It provides that those veterans so restored, and other World War veterans, should be restored upon a basis of 100 percent of the amount which they had received in compensation prior to the enactment of the economy bill—that is, March 20, 1933.

When the House came to deal with these two amendments they placed at the end of section 27 these words, and I read:

Provided, That the rate to be paid to anyone under this section shall be 75 percent of the amount received by him on March 19, 1933.

In section 28, in which the House made no amendment, we still have the Senate provision that the restoration shall be made upon the basis of 100 percent. And so the two sections are in conflict with each other.

The Veterans' Administration, in its study of this measure after the House amendments had been agreed to, sent a memorandum up to the conferees, and in this memorandum the lawyers of the Veterans' Administration point out this conflict and suggest that it ought to be dealt with or else we will have in one section of the law a provision that the presumptives shall be restored at the rate of 75 percent of their former rate and in the other provision of the law that they shall be restored 100 percent of their former rate.

I consulted the legislative council of the Senate concerning the contention made by the lawyers of the Veterans' Administration and I found that our own legislative council was in agreement with the position taken by the lawyers of the Veterans' Administration.

Therefore, it would seem necessary, in order to make sense out of the amendment, that we adopt an amendment which would remove the conflict.

The drafting room, in preparing the amendment which I have sent to the desk, has sought to cure the conflict by striking the language to which I have referred out of section 27, and placing it, with some modification, in section 28; so that there will be no limitation at all in section 27, and so that in section 28 there will be one consistent provision uncontradicted by any other part of the bill.

In order to make the amendment fit in section 28, the legislative counsel suggested a restatement of the language on page 43 of the bill, commencing in line 8. That restatement does not substantially change or modify the effect of the amendment, but it does make such a change that the language which the House added at the end of section 27 may be incorporated in the amendment without doing violence to any other language; and I call attention in that regard to the end of the amendment which has just been read, wherein it is stated:

But veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is reestablished as service-connected under such section 200 by section 27 of title III of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, shall be paid 75 percent of the compensation under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and such rating schedule.

In other words, Mr. President, we have taken away the amendment at the end of 27 as placed there by the House, moved it over into a restated proviso in section 28, and there have stated the same identical limitation of 75 percent upon which the House has voted and to which it has agreed upon three successive votes.

I hope, Mr. President, that this amendment may be agreed to; and I will say that, if it is agreed to, so far as I am concerned, I shall not resist the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get the Senator's idea of just how he can make his amendment apply now. The motion pending is one to recede, as I understand.

Mr. STEIWER. And concur.

Mr. NORRIS. To recede and concur. The Senator is offering this as an amendment?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. As I understand the situation, it is that in section 28 the provision is that there shall be no reduction, and the thought of the Senator from Oregon and the thought of the legislative council is that there will be a conflict of interpretation of that language and the language in section 27, which authorized a reduction to 75 percent, but not below 75 percent. If there was doubt in the mind of the officials interpreting it, and it were construed to be no reduction, then it would be exactly what the Senator has contended for. If, however, they construed it as the language of section 27 justifies, they would construe that it authorized a reduction in those cases to 75 percent. That is the fact?

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is right, Mr. President.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator wants to have it inserted in order to avoid, if possible, misinterpretations by counsel. I have no objection to it, I admit, except this. The Senator knows that under the rules of the House—they were changed a few years ago—the House conferees cannot agree to the amendment because it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and under their rule they cannot agree in conference but must act upon the amendment on the floor of the House. I am wondering whether the necessity for clarification is so serious in the mind of the Senator as to cause him to believe that it is essential to take the action he proposes, or whether in view of the fact that the second section really authorizes exactly what he wants, he would object to concurring. I have no serious objection to the amendment, except that when we agree to it and send it to the House, and it gets to the floor of the House, it is again presented for consideration and for amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. I do regard the amendment as of considerable importance. The only means by which the inconsistency in the law as it has come to us from the House could be avoided would be for the attorneys of the Veterans' Administration to say that in section 27 we have one provision, in section 28 another provision, and that because they are in conflict we will interpret the whole law, and will read out of the law the language that is in section 27. That, I think, has been suggested in the Veterans' Administration as a possible solution of this difficulty.

Mr. BYRNES. I would have no objection to supporting a resolution which would clarify the matter, if the Senator should offer it, so as to make the legislation plain, if we could get the bill passed without opening up the whole matter again on the floor of the House. I would be ready to join the Senator in supporting such a resolution.

Mr. STEIWER. Permit me to say that I have talked to a number of the Members of the House, who are very much interested in this legislation, including, I think, two members of the conference committee which represented the House, and I am told by all those with whom I have talked that inasmuch as this amendment does not change the amount and is merely a clarifying amendment, albeit a clarifying amendment of some little importance, they do not anticipate any trouble in obtaining the concurrence of the House with respect to it. I think there will be no great difficulty in that respect.

Mr. BYRNES. No; but the Senator does know that when it is offered it is then open to amendment by any one of the 435 Members on this question.

Mr. STEIWER. I think the Senator correctly states the parliamentary situation, but the House is just as anxious to secure the passage of the bill as we are.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator will agree to concur in the resolution, I will assure him of my hearty support of a resolution which would clarify the matter. I will join with him in endeavoring to have such a resolution adopted.

Mr. STEIWER. I am hesitant to decline an offer of that kind. I know it is made in the very best of faith. But the House might not concur in the views of the Senator from South Carolina and myself unless they are brought to them as a part of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. If the House did not do so then they would not do so now.

Mr. STEIWER. I think the House would do so if it were brought to them as a part of the bill. Let us concur in the amendment to the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I was making the offer based on the statement of the Senator from Oregon that the House would not object, because it was only for the purpose of clarification. I think the Senator is right so far as this particular amendment is concerned. My only concern is that under their rules it opens up the whole subject for further amendments, and we will have to come back to the Senate for further action on the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. That, I hope, is not going to happen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the House amendment.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I hope, of course, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] will accept the clarifying amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. His acceptance of such an amendment would certainly make the whole situation much clearer in my own mind than it now is.

Mr. President, we have come to the point where it is perfectly clear that the Senate has to yield. Whether it yields today or yields tomorrow or next week is a comparatively unimportant point. I do not think we ought to yield so long as there is any chance of the other House conceding any material point or accepting some such amendment as that offered by the Senator from Oregon which will strengthen the position which the Senate originally adopted in favor of the disabled veterans.

Even if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, the fact remains that the Senate has been defeated while standing on grounds which it considered absolutely sound and which have never been opposed on a question of principle by any debater in either House of Congress.

We have been playing our part in a farce.

The whole idea of a conference, Mr. President, between two disagreeing Houses is that the managers on both sides, firmly convinced of the strength of the position taken respectively by the disagreeing Houses, should get together around the table, try to straighten out the differences and endeavor to come to some middle ground which both Houses can accept.

When the present conferees were appointed, I called attention to the rule in the Manual on Conferences that a majority of the managers on each side should represent the prevailing opinion of the House of Congress which they represent. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was at that time in the chair, and I certainly do not blame him for having appointed the conferees whom he did. I think any one of us sitting in the chair considers himself merely a lieutenant for the Vice President, the permanent presiding officer, and naturally acts in questions of appointment along the line which the permanent presiding officer would pursue.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that on this bill there were only two record votes on controversial subjects of major importance. The first one was as to the pay cut. That vote, which took place on February 21, 1934, was carried by a majority of 1—a vote of 41 to 40; and in the minority we find recorded the names of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], all three of whom were appointed as the majority members of the managers of the conference representing the Senate.

The other record vote, on the Steiwer-McCarran amendment concerning the Spanish-American War veterans was taken on February 26, 1934. The vote resulted yeas 51, nays 40, and among the 40 I find the names of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. It is true that on the final vote on the veterans' amendment the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] voted with a majority of the Senate; but on the actual subjects which were principally in controversy and which were debated on the floor of the Senate it will be found that a majority of the managers of the conference represented the minority opinion of the Senate.

I do not allude to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], because, in the first place, I think it was improperly attached to the veterans' amendment, and, moreover, it does not seem to me to be one of the major subjects which were then in controversy. Still, if anyone should consider it a major subject, it will be found that the same statement applies to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, namely, that a majority of the Senate conferees voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, which amendment was adopted by the Senate.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, what can be said about the system of conferences which we pursue? How can men properly represent an opinion with which they totally and conscientiously disagree? Any criticism which I am offering is not directed at the individuals who represented the Senate. They did merely what has been done from time immemorial, and it would have been strange if they had refused appointment under the circumstances. But I am criticising the system, and I think something has to be done about it before the Senate and House of Representatives may properly function together as concurrent legislative bodies.

I sympathize thoroughly with what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] said a little while ago. He felt that, being out of sympathy with the majority sentiment of the Senate, he would be criticised if he yielded to the wishes of the House of Representatives, and so he bent over backwards and insisted that the Senate's position must be maintained without striking out a word or a syllable. To my mind, both these attitudes are equally untenable when trying to iron out a question in conflict between the two Houses of Congress.

Of course there may be certain questions of principle where the Senate is on one side and the House of Representatives is on the other side. Some of these questions cannot be compromised; they have got to be decided yes or no; one House has got to yield. In most of these cases, however, and especially where the question at issue is one of rates or of sums of money, it is perfectly possible for the two Houses to compromise their differences. That is what I think the system of conferences was meant to promote.

As I understand, the conferees in this case felt bound on the one side and on the other to maintain the position adopted by the respective bodies which had appointed them as conferees. It seems very strange that not only did the Senate conferees represent the minority sentiment of the Senate, but it will be found by looking at the vote taken in the House on March 14, 1934, that when the Taber amendment, which was the prevailing view of the House, was adopted by a vote of 223 to 191, 4 of the 6 conferees representing the House voted with the minority. So we have a situation which seems to me perfectly preposterous. The House conferees are in disagreement with the position of the House and the Senate conferees are in disagreement with the position of the Senate.

I submit, human nature being what it is, that not much benefit can be obtained from a conference conducted by men under such circumstances. And, of course, the result was what might have been expected. The veterans' amendments have gone back to the House three times and the House has turned them down. Once, it is true, they were turned down by a majority of only 1 vote, but a majority of 1, of course, should bind the conferees of the body as much as a majority of a hundred. So, Mr. President, with the situation as it is, I do not believe that we are going to be able to do anything more for the veterans at this time than what is represented by the action of the House of Representatives.

Whether we should yield today or yield tomorrow, I am not prepared to say. In my judgment, it will depend very largely on what happens to the amendment offered now by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the situation, if we support the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina, we lower the compensation of the veterans and increase our own.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator from Idaho is correct. It is fair to say again that the House debated at great length the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho and that there seemed to be very little sentiment over there in favor of it. Eventually we are going to have to yield on that point, I believe. I dislike to argue that particular subject because I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Idaho when it was offered, and therefore I might fail to do it justice; but I think the Senator's statement of the situation is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, the interesting thing to me in the whole debate is that there was not a single argument advanced on the floor of the Senate against the justice of the attitude taken by the Senate. The same thing applies almost literally to the debates in the House, although there were one or two Members who had some minor criticism to make of the Senate amendment. Practically the whole debate in both Houses of Congress has been relative solely to the question of whether or not the President of the United States would sign or veto the bill in one form or another.

To my mind that is a secondary question. I can imagine, if this were the last day of the session and we were going to adjourn, that it might become a debatable point whether a Senator had better vote for something in which he disbelieved rather than have all legislation defeated. But that is not the position which we occupy today. We are going to be in session, I imagine, for a considerable length of time.

Furthermore, so far as the Senate is concerned, the veterans' amendments en bloc were adopted by a vote of 69 to 15 in the Senate, so it is obvious that a Presidential veto would have no effect so far as the Senate is concerned.

It is, of course, inconceivable that any Senator who voted for legislation on the basis of his conscience would thereafter vote against it because someone else might have differing views.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. While it is true that the amendment as finally perfected was adopted on roll call by a vote of 69 to 15, the real test came on the vote on the Steiwer-McCarran amendment.

Mr. CUTTING. That is the vote to which I am referring.

Mr. BARKLEY. Many voted on the final roll call against the Steiwer amendment which was substituted for the Senate provision.

Mr. CUTTING. To what particular amendment is the Senator referring? There were several Steiwer-McCarran amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. There may have been two or three amendments put in the bill, but I refer to the final vote on the amendment after it was perfected.

Mr. CUTTING. I am referring to the final vote on the Steiwer-McCarran amendment, known now as "Senate amendment numbered 22."

Mr. BARKLEY. Many Senators who voted for that amendment as finally perfected voted against the various amendments that made it up piece by piece.

Mr. CUTTING. Only one of them was adopted by the Senate on a record vote, and that particular amendment will apparently go out now.

Mr. BARKLEY. There was no roll call, I believe, on the veterans' amendments, except the one particularly relating to the Spanish-American War veterans. If I am mistaken about that, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. CUTTING. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. There was no real test in the Senate on the sentiment of the Senate upon the particular amendment that went in to make up and perfect the final amendment.

Mr. CUTTING. I completely disagree with the Senator in that respect. The Byrnes amendment, as amended by the amendments of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], with everything in it which is now contained in the so-called "amendment numbered 22", everything that we are now discussing, was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 69 to 15, the Senator from Kentucky voting in the affirmative. Before that vote was taken the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Democratic floor leader, warned Senators that the adoption of the Senate amendment would probably bring a veto. So did several other Senators likewise warn the Senate. I cannot conceive—in fact, I should be violating a rule of the Senate if I even suggested—that any Senator who, after that warning, voted for the amendment would thereafter, after the veto had actually come here, vote against it. In fact, I do not care to pursue any further a slanderous notion of that kind.

But there is something else at stake besides the question of a veto, which I regard as of secondary importance. The important factor is the attitude of the House of Representatives, the coordinate body at the other end of the Capitol.

That body, having all the facts before it, did what I think is very rarely done in that body. It three times took a record vote on the Senate proposals. Those proposals were defeated each time. I disagree with the attitude taken by the House of Representatives. I believe that the original Steiwer-McCarran veterans' amendment was sound in every respect and, so believing, I voted for it. Still, of course, in all legislation the time comes, if there is a diametrical divergence of opinion, when one House or the other has to yield.

I am quite convinced in this case that the Senate is going to have to yield, but I hope that the Senate will yield only after obtaining every inch of ground that it can in favor of the position we adopted by a vote of 69 to 15.

Mr. President, with regard to the vote in the House, I believe that Members who voted attached a great deal of importance to a letter which the legislative vice chairman of the American Legion sent to many Members of the House of Representatives. The letter was signed by John Thomas Taylor, vice president of the legislative committee of the Legion, and I desire to read it:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D.C., March 21, 1934.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Tomorrow, Thursday, you will again vote on the question of sustaining the House amendments to the independent offices bill, or concurring in the Senate amendments thereto.

It is our opinion that if the House recedes and concurs in the Senate amendments relative to World War veterans, the bill that will go to the President will be vetoed, in which event the veterans will obtain nothing by way of legislation.

The House amendments contain substantially three points of the American legion four-point program. A vote for them would at least be an effort to provide relief for the World War disabled which is the object of the American Legion.

We respectfully request that you lend your aid and assistance in seeing that the House insists upon its own amendments relative to World War veterans. We are convinced that if the bill goes to the President with the House amendments it will be signed.

Very truly yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

Here we have the legislative committee of the American Legion assuring the Members of the House of Representatives, first, that if they adopt the Senate amendments the bill will be vetoed; second, that if they adopt the House amendments the bill will be signed.

I have no idea what authority the legislative committee of the Legion had for any such statement; and, of course, in the nature of events it will be impossible to prove both those assertions untrue. I disagree with the action taken by Mr. Taylor. I am sure he took it in good faith. Mr. Taylor is my friend. I have worked with him for years, and expect to work with him in the future, I think, however, that he made a mistake when he gave this advice to Members of one of the coordinate branches of Congress, and I think, frankly, the House made a mistake when it followed the suggestions and advice of Colonel Taylor.

Nevertheless, the fact remains the same. The House did adopt that suggestion. The House, no matter what the private beliefs of some of its Members may have been, voted against the Senate amendments; and, as I have said before, sooner or later we shall have to yield to the force of facts.

Whether we yield today or whether we yield tomorrow, I desire to serve notice on the Senate, for my own part, that this fight has just begun; that this is not the end of the fight for justice to the disabled veterans of the World War and of previous wars. The soundness and justice of the presumptive clause which was passed after discussion, but without a record vote, in both Houses of Congress back in 1924 was never disputed for a moment until the past year or so. In 1930, when it was proposed to prolong the presumptive period from 5 years to 10, Mr. Hoover vetoed it on the ground, then first suggested, that to pass such legislation would be a legislative lie. In spite of that statement, reiterated on two consecutive vetoes—one with respect to the Spanish-American veterans and one with respect to the World War veterans—there were only six Members of the Senate of the United States who agreed with Mr. Hoover in his attitude. Sixty-six Members, including every man who then sat on the Democratic side of the aisle, voted against Mr. Hoover and in favor of extending the presumptive period from 5 years to 10.

Now, when it is proposed to preserve for these veterans what they have had by law since 1924, we hear not a word of argument. We hear not a word against the justice of the principle. We merely hear suggestions that somebody else, in some other position, may disagree with us.

Mr. President, these veterans have arranged their lives according to the action of Congress taken in 1924. They have married, they have begotten children, they have made the whole plans for their future existence, confiding in what they believe was a pledge of their Government. Even if the principle was wrong, even if we should criticize the law of 1924 as a historical fact, it remains a fact. That law established the principle under which we have been acting for 10 long years.

Are we going to turn out in the street those men—every one of them helpless, every one of them incapable of earning a living—because of any objection raised at this late hour? I hope not; and I say that regardless of the fate of the legislation which is before us at the moment, regardless of whether the bill goes back to conference or whether we concur in the House amendment at the present time, the fight for justice for these men is going on, and there will continue to be Members of this body who will delight to wage it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, what is going on now is precisely the carrying on in this Government of a policy that has been continuing since the 4th of last March. The discrimination against the veterans of the United States has been such that the entire country is thoroughly convinced of its unfairness.

The Senate did not do any particular justice to these veterans when it added amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill. True, the Senate amendments were more generous than those suggested by the House, but they fell far short of justice. Now it is proposed that the Senate even withdraw some of the benefits that it had held out toward those who wore the uniform and agree with the House of Representatives in the amendments that have been suggested over there.

I can learn only one reason for this proposal in inquiring around about the matter, and that is that somehow or other somebody has an idea that possibly the President of the United States might veto the bill if it should contain the Senate amendments. Mr. President, that is his responsibility. We have ours here; and it is up to us to do justice to these men who have worn the uniform and to be fair with them, regardless of what the attitude of the President may be. On the other hand, it is suggested that even if the House amendments should be accepted by the Senate and added to the bill, the Chief Executive will veto it.

So I have been unable to find anybody who understands just what is in the President's mind. Accordingly, it seems to me, the sensible thing to do would be to attempt to extend some element of justice to the veterans, who have been kicked around like dogs for the past year, ever since this administration came into power. Let us go ahead and do our job. If the President should veto the bill, let him take the responsibility, and let us then pass the bill over his veto. Let us stand for justice. God knows, the veterans of the United States have had little of it during the past year.

The entire Economy Act, so-called, should be repealed. Every line of it should be repealed, and some of us have tried to have it repealed in toto during this session, but we have not been able to get enough support to have it done. We will never rest content, however, until we shall have wiped that blot off the escutcheon of the United States. Ultimately it will have to go, every bit of it.

Of course, I cannot agree to concur in the House amendments. We have spent untold billions of dollars here during the past year in an orgy of extravagance such as the world never has seen before, and yet we kick the veterans out of the hospitals as if they were dogs. Now, when it comes to a few dollars that may represent the difference between living with some degree of comfort and actual starvation, we undertake to yield to the House with amendments that are positively inadequate so far as the veterans are concerned.

Mr. President, as I see the matter, I agree with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], at least to this extent: The battle has just begun. We propose to press the fight until the veterans of the United States have some degree of justice from the Government which they served and for which they sacrificed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the pending vote upon the Steiwer motion to concur with an amendment the final vote, or is it exclusively a vote upon the Steiwer amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be upon the Steiwer amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will there be subsequently an independent vote on a motion to concur?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After that will come a vote on the motion to concur in the amendment as amended.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] a question. Do I understand the Senator's position to be that he personally does not approve the amendments adopted by the House relating to veterans?

Mr. BYRNES. No; I do not.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator is advocating concurrence of the Senate in the House proposal as the most satisfactory way of ending the disputes over veterans' legislation that have taken place between the two branches of the Government.

Mr. BYRNES. That is the statement I have made.

Mr. WALSH. Personally, I shall support the position taken by the Senator from South Carolina, but for the reason that I favor the House amendments and hope that they may become law. The amendments adopted by the House, I understand, embody the American Legion program and also appear to be a satisfactory adjustment of the dispute between the Executive and the Congress as to the rate upon which Spanish War veterans are to be restored to the pension lists. It was apparent that the Senate amendments would never be approved by the Executive, especially after the Senate fixed the limit of 90 percent upon Spanish War pensions and when the President conceded 75 percent to those who appealed to him and also by adding without a record vote many amendments that exceed the demands of veterans' organizations.

I believe the American Legion program, as finally presented to the Congress, was fair and reasonable. It dealt only with actually disabled veterans. In my opinion, every doubt, where a veteran is actually disabled, ought to be resolved in favor of the veterans. I favored the amendment offered that would accomplish this end when this bill was before the Senate, but unfortunately the Senate loaded the bill with other blanket amendments which it was evident the President would not accept.

The Senate, by its avalanche of amendments, regardless of merit under existing economic conditions, put itself in the position where the President could charge it with sending him a bill for approval that put willful-misconduct veterans, after-war veterans, high-salaried veterans with non-service-connected disabilities, and remarried widows of veterans back on the pension roll, in addition to returning to the pension roll between two and three thousand emergency officers at rates ranging from $106 to $416 a month, each based upon the same disability that an enlisted man receives $30 a month for, and which they would receive without this law. We will be doing the veterans of this country a disservice when we place back into the hands of their enemies the same weapons or some cases to destroy them with before the American people that they had before the enactment of the Economy Act in March 1933. My belief is that a real friend of the veterans should want to put back as many deserving and meritorious cases as possible, and not only make no effort to restore undeserving cases or grant special and unwarranted benefits to any veterans but should assist in purging the pension rolls of all cases that should not be on it.

Since the Senate amendments went to the House, the House has eliminated some of the Senate amendments that exceeded the requests of veteran organizations and retained the presumptive principle of giving compensation to veterans actually disabled. The these reasons I favor concurring in the House amendments.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, earlier in the debate I attempted to state the attitude of the legal division of the Veterans' Administration in the interpretation made of sections 27 and 28 of the bill. I think there is no controversy upon the subject, but in order that the RECORD may show exactly what was said in the analysis made by the Veterans' Administration, I want to read a brief paragraph from the memorandum which they submitted to the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The part I read relates to section 28, which is the section making complete restoration of the compensation payments to certain types of veterans. I mention that, because it is necessary to bear in mind that they are talking about section 28 in order to understand the paragraph which I now read:

The House of Representatives approved this section as written without amendment, but in view of the limitation of 75 percent of payments in cases where service connection was severed under Public, No. 2, or Public, No. 78, and restored the amendment, contained in section 27 of this title, the question is raised as to the interpretation to be placed upon this particular section. It is believed that clarification will be necessary as under this section no reductions are authorized in such cases.

Mr. President, I have one other matter to which I should like to make brief reference, and with respect to which I invite the attention of the Senator from South Carolina. He made the statement that he had no objection to the clarifying amendment which I had offered, except by reason of the parliamentary situation in the House of Representatives. As I understood his contention, it was to the effect that if the Senate agreed to the amendment which is now pending, because it is in the nature of an amendment on an appropriation bill, when it went back to the House of Representatives it would be open to further amendment, and therefore possibly to prolonged delay.

I always like to agree with the Senator from South Carolina and to accommodate him, because he is always so accommodating to me, and therefore, acting strictly upon impulse, and without consideration, I agreed with him, and stated that I thought his position so taken was correct.

On reflection, it seems to me that we were both in error. The situation, Senators will observe, is this: The House passed the independent offices appropriation bill, the Senate placed an amendment upon the bill, the House then amended the amendment, and we now propose to amend the amendment of the House. This amendment is in order, because not in the third degree, but any other or further amendment would be out of order in either body. I think there can be no controversy of that proposition, and to make sure that my opinion was reasonably correct, I consulted the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who was in the chair at the time, and he coincided in my view. Our own parliamentarian, without claiming to be an authority on the House rules, also coincided with my view.

I have here the House Manual, and from it let me read just one paragraph, which I think makes the situation clear. I read:

A bill originating in one House is passed by the other with an amendment.

The originating House agrees to their amendment with an amendment. The other may agree to their amendment with an amendment, that being only in the second and not the third degree; for, as to the amending House, the first amendment with which they passed the bill is a part of its text. It is the only text they have agreed to. The amendment to that text by the originating House therefore is only in the first degree, and the amendment to that again by the amending House is only in the second, to wit, an amendment to an amendment, and so admissible.

Mr. President, the offer now made is of an amendment to the amendment. It is admissible, but it is the last amendment which can be made.

If I am right in this—and I appeal to the good judgment of the Senator from South Carolina, now that his attention is directed to it—the suggestion made by the Senator is not in point. The only suggestion he made, therefore, no longer is to be considered, and this amendment offered by me will stand before the Senate without valid objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement, in accordance with which there is to be a limitation of debate on the Bankhead bill at 4 o'clock. We have now consumed nearly 2 hours of the time. I wonder whether it would not be possible to have an agreement that the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on Saturday to limit debate upon the Bankhead bill be modified. I do not desire to delay action on the pending question, nor do I desire to limit debate upon it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the agreement entered into Saturday, late in the afternoon, was in pursuance of a proposal I made, that we limit debate on the Bankhead bill at 4 o'clock today.

Mr. BORAH. That is as I understood.

Mr. McNARY. In view of the absence of the Senator having the cotton bill in charge, as well as in the absence of the Democratic leader, I think we should have a quorum called. I am heartily in accord with the general purpose of the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Instead of calling a quorum, suppose we wait for a while. Perhaps the Democratic leader will be in the Chamber in a few moments.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think the Senator's suggestion is apt. The Senator from Arkansas will probably be in the Chamber in a few moments, and can respond to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, addressing myself to the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and addressing myself to the subject generally, I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is entirely and positively essential. I believe it is essential in order that the will of the House of Representatives may be carried out, if for no other reason, because it is undoubtedly an amendment inserted out of place, and the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is a clarifying amendment, which will carry out the spirit and will of those who offer it. Enough of that.

Now, addressing myself to the primary subject, the life of a nation, regardless of its condition, depends upon its militant forces. It makes no difference how we may adhere to pacifism, it makes no difference how we may love peace, from time immemorial the armies of a nation have been its backbone, and the militant forces of a nation spell its history. The armies of the United States have written the history of this country.

Mr. President, a nation lives in its militant forces in three distinct stages. The first is preparation for defense, in which those of us who believe in a virile national life are always interested. I should like to see the navy of this country carry the flag of the United States into foreign waters where it might be loved, where other flags were only feared. I should like to see a standing army of reasonable strength, so that nations might look upon us with a degree of respect. That is enough for preparation.

Then, when the hour of war comes, every sinew and every muscle of a nation is strained, and no one questions that there is one thing all desire; namely, to win the war. Everything is conscripted so that the war shall be won. Whether right or wrong, we are then in the battle, and we propose to win.

Then comes the third stage, the stage which looks back on those who won the war, looks back upon them with an eye of consolation, in the first place, and an eye of gratitude in the second, always looking to the future, because how will we build the army of tomorrow save and except by our example and precept set as to the army of yesterday? If we are to forget those who bared their breasts to the foe during the World War and during the Spanish-American War, what are we to say to those whom we would call to war tomorrow, if war should come? Are we going to say to them, "We have set the example for you; we have forgotten your brothers who bore arms in our defense from 1917 to 1919; we have cast them out of beds which Government money provided in order that they might be cared for; we have thrown them out on the street, and we have said to communities, 'You will bear the burden of these afflicted men, although they became afflicted because they responded to the Nation's call?'"

I say that by the care we give to the army of yesterday we may call with confidence on the army of tomorrow. If Senators do not think there will be an army of tomorrow, then those who believe in Sacred Writ should remember that the Nazarene said there will be "wars and rumors of wars" until the end of time. So the army of tomorrow is the thing we may think of, and national integrity and national destiny are in our hands today.

Why have we struggled here during the special session and during the present session to take care of the veterans of former wars? When I say "take care of the veterans of former wars" I have reference to those wars which are within our own recollection and some which are not within our recollection. If there ever was a class of soldiers that gave their all to our Nation in her hour of need, it was the class of soldiers that went into the Spanish-American War. If there ever were soldiers who were mistreated by a Nation, it was the soldiers of the Spanish-American War, because they went into the Army at a time when we were not prepared for war, and they went into it at a time when our Nation was calling for volunteers, and the red blood of America was ready to go, even though the hardship in itself was sufficient to take life.

Some of those soldiers never gained the dignity of a battlefield, but they went into camps that were unprepared for their reception; they were compelled to endure climatic conditions which were not at all conducive to their welfare or to their health, and they left behind them the virility of youth and manhood, and many of them, thousands of them, came back broken wrecks, glad to get out of the service, not waiting to be examined, never caring what would happen to them; they only saw the future and went on.

When we compare the system of examination of the discharged soldier of the Spanish-American War with the system of examination, in all its detail, that was resorted to when the soldiers of the World War went out of the service, we will see that the Spanish-American War veteran had no consideration whatever given him. He simply went out of the service. He thought he was healthy, although he had gone through pestilence-ridden camps, had gone into foreign fields, had battled against foreign foes, and had inherited the ills that come from such conditions.

For those veterans of foreign wars we have here struggled. We asked for a restoration of 90 percent. That was the amendment that was adopted by the Senate. It went over to the House of Representatives, and by three record votes they refused to adopt our amendment. They did adopt an amendment of 75 percent.

At least we have made progress. At least we have done something for that particular class of veterans.

Then we come to the World War veteran, and I want to say to those who were so kind as to adhere to my views during the time when the amendments were pending in the Senate, that my one consolation is that we have made progress for the soldiers of the past wars. We have gained for them some solace, some relief, some advantage. The battle is only in the making, for tomorrow we will carry it on again. But the Steiwer amendment now offered to the House amendment is entirely essential for the purpose of clarification, and I ask those who are interested in this matter to stand together and vote for the Steiwer amendment so that the whole situation may be clarified, and the House amendment, with the clarification, may become law, as I hope it will.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in view of the very aggressive and very vigorous and able fight made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] in the last session and also in this session, and their very wide knowledge of veterans' problems, I will ask, if I may, a question of the Senator from Oregon, because it is a matter of intense interest to myself and my colleague [Mr. DILL]. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he sincerely believes that the bill in its present form, as amended by the House, is the best that we can hope to put through the present Congress for the veterans of the United States? If the Senator would frankly answer that I should be very happy.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, of course the attitude that might be taken by the House under every conceivable kind of condition is merely a matter of speculation and judgment. But to answer the Senator's question, I do believe that we will gain more for the veterans, and come nearer to accomplishing justice, by concurring with the amendment at this time than we would by prolonging the struggle. The House has three times voted on this proposition. Their last vote demonstrated a stronger sentiment to remain adamant than their earlier vote, and it would seem that nothing could be gained by prolonging the struggle at this time.

I ought to say in fairness to myself rather than in answer to the Senator's question that I am not satisfied with the attitude which the House of Representatives has taken. I am not satisfied with respect to the Spanish-American War veterans, in cutting the restoration down to 75 percent, and particularly in excluding from the restored class that great group of nonparticipating veterans who enlisted after August 12, 1898. I think we are working an injustice upon that great group. But in the face of the possibility of veto, in the face of the attitude of the House, I have reached the conclusion that it is better for us to concur, in the knowledge, of course, that concurrence would pass the bill, and in the hope that it might avoid a veto, and in the further hope that if there is a veto we would feel that there was some chance of passing the bill over the veto.

I feel sure that if we adhere to the Senate's position we should have no chance at all of passing the bill over a veto, and all the effort that has been made in behalf of the worthy veterans who are covered by this act would go for nothing.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his statement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, like many other Senators I have had a large number of requests from veterans' organizations and others to define my position on the bonus and on veterans' legislation in general.

A few days ago I drafted a statement for the press setting forth my views, and I now ask that that statement be printed in the RECORD in connection with this debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The question of the payment in cash of the adjusted-compensation certificates held by veterans is once again before Congress, and many appeals for it that grip my sympathies are constantly urged. It includes paying 10 years' interest not yet due upon certificates not payable until 1945. The cash payment at this time is opposed by President Roosevelt, as it was by his Republican predecessors.

I urged and voted for outright and immediate cash settlement of the bonus when Congress first dealt with the matter. Thereafter and prior to the 1929 collapse I continued to favor cash settlement and so voted at every opportunity. Now, unfortunately, new obstacles exist which cannot be waived aside without serious consequences to the whole country.

With the prostration of industry, the tremendously diminished Government tax revenues, the huge deficits in the Federal Treasury which 1 year ago was imperiling our national solvency, the laying upon the Treasury the requirement to procure funds to pay immediately in cash $2,000,000,000 or more of certificates 10 or more years in advance of their maturity date became a very different matter.

Against the dictates of my personal desires, which have prompted me until this depression overtook us to support wholeheartedly the most liberal and generous benefits requested by the veterans and their organizations, I have felt, and still feel, constrained to heed the warnings of the Treasury that the payment of a cash bonus at this time would greatly jeopardize the Government's finances and its credit—the very foundation of any national economy recovery.

If it could be definitely asserted that the depths of the depression had been reached and we were on the upturn, we might be able to defend this expenditure in view of the distressed condition of many veterans. But the depression is far indeed from being over. It is believed by many that were it not for the vast Government expenditures, reaching billions, of borrowed money during the past year, we would have had more distress and suffering than in any period since the depression began. Neither can I agree that because we have borrowed billions for relief of one kind or another we should borrow this two billion.

What the future presents in relieving the vast army of unemployed, and the necessity of relief not only to veterans and their families but also to from 10 to 25 percent of the people, who are in actual want and through no fault of their own are and will be for a long time to come dependent upon the Public Treasury for food, clothing, and shelter, cannot be foreseen. As recent as last November one agency of the Government estimated that there were 5,000,000 destitute children in the country.

One need not be an alarmist to assert that he who dares suggest the year when these vast expenditures of a primary obligation will end would be a reckless prophet. We spent billions of dollars last year for relief of various kinds. Some of this money went directly—more of it indirectly—to bonus-certificate holders and their families and millions of other unemployed citizens. The same amounts of even more may be required for several years to come to protect the homes and savings of our people and to succor those in want and to keep many in private industry employed through Government aid of various kinds.

There is a limit to what the Government can borrow. It is my personal view we are well up to that limit now. Yet the starving, the homeless, the sick and disabled, and all those who are unable to care for themselves must be sustained and cared for at whatever cost. This must always be our first consideration.

I have for some time been convinced that the one absolute necessity above all others in importance to assure future recovery was to wall in the Treasury and credit of the country so that it would not become engulfed in the maelstrom of this depression. Many who have given this problem special and careful consideration believe that this is a weakness in our present program of recovery; namely, that the Treasury is not being sufficiently guarded. All must agree that if conditions get worse the one, indeed the only, prop upon which to rebuild is an unimpaired public credit.

I cannot be a party, whatever the political consequences may be, to blocking the fundamental recovery program of the President by financially impairing the credit of the country upon which he must almost entirely depend. He says the payment of this large sum of money under present conditions would be a serious impediment to his efforts. He is our Commander in Chief in this battle against a depression that is defying all human agencies successfully to combat. Whatever differences we may have over minor expenditures and policies, I cannot forsake the trench in which he is now fighting by authorizing a payment not yet due from the Public Treasury of such vast proportions which he says cannot be undertaken without defeating his efforts for recovery.

When and if our President gives to Congress his assurance that the bonus certificates can be paid in cash without peril to the Treasury and that he favors their payment, I shall be only too happy so to vote.

The payment of the bonus stands on a very different footing from the questions involved with reference to our treatment of and our obligations to those of our Spanish and World War veterans who are sick or disabled. Their just claims for compensation, for hospitalization, for pensions, and for the support of their dependents ought not to be denied or postponed, even though some percentage reductions may be necessary.

I have always stood for the liberal recognition of these claims. I have been against any policy which sought to impose technical barriers against their recognition. Better that some unworthy claims be paid than that one worthy claimant be refused.

The Economy Act of last year worked much injustice upon disabled veterans. Congress and the President have made several efforts and are now doing their best to correct these injustices and to restore, so far as practicable, the pensions and compensation to their former level. It has been a situation where there was grave risk that the consequence of going too far in that direction might be no restoration at all.

The program of the American Legion as finally presented to Congress at this session is in large measure eminently fair and reasonable. I have given and will continue to give it my support. It deals only with actually disabled veterans. In determining the question of whether a disability is of service origin every doubt should be resolved in favor of the veteran. That ought to be our firm policy in dealing with compensation claims. To whatever extent it is necessary to write it into the law to accomplish that end I shall lend my aid.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] to the motion to concur in the House amendment, but I am going to vote against concurring in the House amendment, although I know that amendment is going to be adopted, and that it is, in the opinion of many, expedient to accept it. I cannot gain my own consent, Mr. President, by reason of what appear to be some of the necessities, to place my vote on record to decrease the allotment that the soldiers had before the passage of the Economy Act. I do not care to have my vote go on record, regardless of any apparent necessity to decrease what was being allowed to the soldiers under the Republican administration before the Democratic Party came into power.

I send to the desk an editorial appearing in the Harrisburg Morning Telegraph, of Harrisburg, Pa., entitled "Circulators", as well as an article appearing in the Harrisburg Telegraph entitled "Business and the Bonus", and ask to have them printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The newspaper editorial and article are as follows:

[From the Harrisburg Morning Telegraph]

CIRCULATORS

At least one merchant of Harrisburg proved the bonus paid by the State to her soldier veterans would soon find its way into the channels of trade. His store was crowded; almost a hundred chairs of his shoe store being occupied by customers at one time. This merchant has no doubt of the immediate substantial effect on business of a revision of compensation for the veterans of Pennsylvania. And thousands more checks are still to come.

[From the Harrisburg Telegraph, Harrisburg, Pa., Monday, Mar. 19, 1934]

BUSINESS AND THE BONUS

Harrisburg shops and larger stores have no reason to doubt the material results of the soldiers' bonus distribution which found its way into the streams of trade almost immediately following the issue of several thousand checks of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. One shoe merchant's experience will illustrate.

C. B. Rodney, the Walnut Street shoe dealer, asked the effect of the bonus on his business, replied:

"I did a larger volume of trade on Friday morning than on the whole day of the Saturday previous. Customers crowded the store and bought freely. We have more than 90 chairs, and at one time every one was occupied by a customer. One buyer selected three pairs of the better grade shoes."

Mr. Rodney also mentioned the large bills that came with the bonus rush and the unexpected difficulty in changing these large notes, many being of the $50 denomination. Mr. Rodney said further: "I observed to one veteran the rather unusual size of the notes and he laughed with the remark that it also had been a long time since he saw a $50 bill."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as Chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, I was opposed to the amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill adopted by the Senate. I am in lesser degree opposed to the amendments adopted by the House of Representatives, and I shall, therefore, vote against the motion to concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment, although I frankly state that I think that is the speediest way to determine this question. The bill will then go to the President, and we shall see what the President will do about it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, this morning, when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] presented his amendment, I said I had no objection to the amendment itself, inasmuch as it had for its purpose clarifying inconsistent language, and that I objected only because I believed that under the rules of the other House it would be open to amendment there and thus the discussion and controversy with reference to this bill would further be prolonged. The Senator from Oregon at that time was disposed to agree with me in the statement I made as to the rules of the other House. He has since investigated the matter, and I have also investigated it; and, if the statement of the Senator from Oregon is correct, the amendment would be in the third degree and would therefore not be open to amendment. So, even though it may prolong for some time the consideration of this bill, I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. There will not be the possibility of offering amendments to that amendment when the action of the Senate shall be reported to the other House, and the possibility of such further amendment, as I stated this morning, was my objection to it.

Mr. President, while making that statement, as I am on my feet, I simply want to add a few words with reference to what has been stated by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] as to the conference. I would not prolong a discussion with him on that subject, particularly when he states that the criticism is as to the system, but I want the record to show that, so far as the system is concerned, the Senator could have no complaint to make on the pending measure, inasmuch as the Senate conferees have not receded from a single amendment that was added to the bill by the Senate. On the contrary, in the conference report which has been adopted, the House conferees receded on every amendment; and, as to these legislative proposals, the Senate conferees have not receded but have come back to the Senate to let the Senate act. I hope the motion to concur will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22.

The amendment to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 22 was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on concurring in the House amendment as amended to Senate amendment numbered 22.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, several Senators are absent, and, as they desire to be present, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is necessarily absent from the Senate in attendance upon a funeral.

I further desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on a vote of this importance, I think we should have a roll call, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to concur in the amendment of the House as amended to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when Mr. NYE's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I am authorized to say that, were the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] present, he would vote "yea."

I also announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are detained on official business, and that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent in attendance upon a funeral.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD]. I transfer that pair to my colleague the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am authorized to announce that if the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] were present he would vote "nay." He is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. McNARY (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] who, I am informed, is absent on official business. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEBERT. My colleague the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is necessarily absent. I am authorized to say that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If present, the Senator from North Dakota would vote "nay", and the Senator from Utah would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 39, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. BYRNES to concur in the amendment of the House, as amended, to Senate amendment no. 22 was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, there is still a controversy between the two Houses on one other amendment, no. 23. It has reference only to a section number. Inasmuch as the matter must go back to the House because of the Steiwer amendment to the House amendment, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment numbered 23.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was necessarily called from the Chamber at the time the roll call was ordered upon the amendment just adopted. I did not have an opportunity before the vote was taken to explain the reason which impelled me to vote for the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I think it is only justice to myself and those who feel as I do that the explanation should now be made.

I was impelled so to vote because of the realization that insistence upon the Senate amendment, even if we were victorious over the House of Representatives, would lead us straight into a veto. I have been told that the veto message had already been written, based upon the ground that the Senate had made an inadvertent mistake in extending the benefits to the so-called "misconduct" cases. None of us was conscious that that was the effect of the Senate amendment at the time we adopted it, but undoubtedly it would be so construed, and a veto based upon that ground would undoubtedly be sustained.

For that reason the officials of the Veterans' associations asked us to vote for concurrence in the House amendment. I think it only fair for those of us who voted for the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to have it distinctly understood by the veterans themselves that their representatives here have urged that action upon us. That appears by a letter already in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the legislative representative of the American Legion. It is also the opinion of other veterans' representatives with whom we have consulted in recent hours. It does not involve any surrender of our opinion that the purpose of the Steiwer-McCarran amendment was a just purpose; and I think I speak the thought of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] as well as my own when I say that the best interests of the veterans were subserved by an affirmative vote on this motion.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CUTTING. I certainly am not criticizing the way the Senator voted. I think it was extremely doubtful which way one should vote under the circumstances, as I tried to say a little while ago. If we had not yielded today, we should have had to yield tomorrow; but I wonder whether the Senator's position is well taken insofar as he bases our reasons for voting on the desires of the legislative committee of the American Legion. I understand there are a number of other veterans' organizations which have been consistently opposed to the House amendments. Furthermore, does not the Senator think there were a great many Members of Congress on both sides of the Capitol who were quite as well able to form their own judgments as to what may be the best thing to do for the veterans at some particular stage of the procedure as is the legislative committee of the American Legion?

Mr. REED. Oh, I think so and I do not think they ought to control our votes by any means; but this was an embarrassing vote, because a vote either "yea" or "nay" was easily susceptible of misunderstanding.

Mr. CUTTING. I admit that very frankly.

Mr. REED. And I know that the Senator from New Mexico, whose friendliness for the disabled veteran has been consistent, must have felt the same embarrassment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to briefly state some of the reasons causing me to vote to concur in the House amendments on veterans' compensation and pension provisions of the bill.

It is entirely true, according to my view, as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], that to fail to concur in the House amendment probably would deny to veterans relief to which they are entitled and which they cannot secure under existing law and regulations. The Senate amendments to the bill, of course, are much more liberal than those of the House as the bill came to the Senate from that body, and more liberal than the amendments upon which the House now insists. If the Senate insists upon its amendments there will either be no bill enacted or it will be vetoed if passed.

At this time I desire to point out that when the original Economy Act was pending here in March 1933 I offered an amendment providing that the compensation rates carried in the law and in the regulations prior to that act should not be cut more than 25 percent in the case of World War veterans with service-connected disabilities and in the case of Spanish-American War veterans. Later, about a year ago, when veteran and pension legislation was being considered on the independent offices bill, I offered a similar amendment, which was adopted by the Senate, the Vice President casting the deciding vote. The House refused to accept that amendment, but used it as a basis for a compromise, which was much less liberal than the Senate amendment. It served a useful purpose, because it secured for World War veterans and Spanish War veterans much more liberal treatment than they could otherwise secure.

When the independent offices bill was before the Senate on February 26, 1934, I voted for the amendment providing that cuts in Spanish War pensions could not be more than 25 percent, or a 75-percent rate on Spanish-American War pensions, because I knew that this was the highest possible rate the veterans of that war could obtain. I did not vote against the Spanish War veterans; I voted for them. That amendment was defeated; and I then voted for the Steiwer-McCarran amendment in its entirety, which carried the 90-percent rate on Spanish-American War pensions, as well as rates on World War compensation advocated by the American Legion and other veteran organizations. Since that action was taken by the Senate, the House of Representatives on three different occasions, on record roll-call votes, has refused to agree to the Senate amendments on veterans' affairs. There is no hope of obtaining favorable action on the veterans' amendments as they passed the Senate; and it is a question either of agreeing to the House amendments to this bill and securing some relief for disabled veterans, or of voting down those amendments and having them receive none. This course offers the only hope to secure increased benefits to the disabled veterans, and I propose to vote for substance instead of form. I propose to vote for real relief instead of making gestures.

Those, Mr. President, are the reasons which impelled me to vote to concur in the House amendments to this bill relating to veterans' compensation and Spanish War pensions. These provisions as to Spanish War veterans are practically what I proposed in March 1933, and the World War rates are in substance the same as carried in my amendment of March 1933, and later on the independent offices bill a year ago. If either of my amendments had been accepted by the House and became a law, much suffering and injustice would have been prevented.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senate has consumed 2½ hours today in the discussion of the conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill, and at the suggestion of several Senators, I ask unanimous consent that the agreement under which the Senate is proceeding with regard to House bill 8402, the so-called "Bankhead cotton bill", be modified so that after tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill or any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered thereto.

The effect of this change will be to leave the debate untrammelled by limitation during the remainder of the day, and it will also give approximately the same amount of time for debate that would have been had if the conference report had not been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the agreement heretofore entered into for the consideration of the unfinished business be modified by the provision that after the meeting of the Senate at noon tomorrow no Senator shall speak oftener than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am sure that change meets with the general consent of Senators on this side of the aisle, and I hope the request may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement requested by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that following the passage or disposal of the Bankhead bill, the bonus bill be made the unfinished business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that after the present unfinished business shall have been disposed of, the bonus bill shall be made the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the Senate amendment to House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22 to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 23 to the said bill and concurred therein.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to what may be said to be the reasons which justify such measures as the one now before the Senate, designated as a cotton-control bill, presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I do not profess any knowledge, as to cotton in its relation to the market or the farm, comparable to that which the eminent Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] no doubt present in support of this bill.

Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate a consideration which is brought to my mind by the public press of this morning and yesterday as reported in the proceedings of the Parliament of England, the Orders in Council of Britain, the legislation of France, and the immediate order that has transpired in Italy in connection with the colleague countries.

The condition of the United States today, as to its foreign trade, must be viewed with a perfectly plain vision on the part of America. The United States may desire to increase her export trade, and greatly deplores the loss of that which she has suffered, for it cannot be held out with any hope to its own people that there can be an immediate restoration from the difficult situation under which they have labored as a reward to them for their patience, for the present conditions clearly suggest that, as to export trade, the foreign lands of every clime are opposing the United States, and are taking every step that is conceivable, through practical operation, to obstruct and debar us from opportunity.

We note, sir, that Great Britain has proceeded by a tariff policy that lays a barrier against us, but which is within her power and her authority. France has entered into an agreement with five different countries to give precedence to their own commodities, in every respect, over everything and anything which may come from the United States. Italy frankly confides to the world her policy is one of retaliation as against our trade, insofar as concerns entering into relations with other lands which give them precedences in exchange for that which Italy is so soon to enjoy from those with whom she has entered into arrangements.

Mr. President, very shortly there will be presented to this honorable body a suggestion from an eminent and authoritative source looking to some remedy as to our export trade, and we turn to ask ourselves the question, What is to be done? Unless something shall be done by this country which will remove the antagonisms which literally hiss their curses against us and will lift the bars which now are dropped down as an obstruction toward our entrance into the world with our exports, then we will have no exportations, and the markets which we had hoped to obtain in behalf of our home people will have been wholly denied and will wholly fail.

We all rejoice in the prospect that the distinguished President, and the sense of our community at large, without regard to party, may bring some result of repair—it may be by the tender of measures which go by the alluring name of "reciprocity", or it may take on some other form which will be satisfactory in its result to our people. But we cannot be blind to the truth that the length of time this will occupy must diminish the hopes of our people proportionately, and leave them for a considerable season before they can enjoy the results, however propitiously put before the country.

The President of the United States is today in an interesting position, and, for our country, we must look upon him as occupying a station that has been paralleled many times just about this long after inauguration. The President of the United States now confronts a test, and it is about this time following inauguration when similar tests of the support of the President have awakened into conflict and rivalry during every administration from that of William McKinley. I speak something of personal knowledge of the period from the McKinley administration; what preceded McKinley's administration is not borne unto me other than as others would gather it from repairing to history. It fell to me to enter the House of Representatives for the first time during the McKinley administration, and it is because I am able to trace events from that administration to the present time that I say it is about after this length of time from inauguration that there arises opposition to the President in power, wherever partisan purposes may profit by it or personal concern or local benefit may follow from it.

The President of the United States of today confronts before the country the following questions: Is the country with him? Is Congress against him? Will Congress support the mandate which came from the popular vote which placed the President in position, and authorized his advocacy of measures such as he stated were the issues as presented by him in public addresses before the country? Will the country recognize the changes which have transpired in respect of commerce and business throughout the world, and note the mishap which has followed America in an experience of loss, and something of the despair she is compelled to endure as the result of that which has transpired?

Shall not the President have a right to submit the query to this Congress, Are you with me, or are you against me? Has not the country the right to know whether the measures submitted by the President are going to receive the support of Congress? Has not the President the right to know whether those who come as the agents of the people are going to aid in carrying out the measures as submitted by the President in expression of what he feels to be for the welfare of his people?

Mr. President, if, for partisan purpose on the one hand, or the demands of local benefit on the other, or, filling in the triangle, because of any personal obstacle or personal disappointment of the individual, there shall begin obstruction to the policy of the President as sent to the Congress to be executed, we might as well despair of any results to the people which could repair their wrongs or could restore their rights.

We have observed, through the experiences of other Presidents, a situation similar to that of today, except that it may be said that a greater support from the public heart of America is given to the present President of the United States than that which we have seen at any other period in our lifetime extended to any other President who has been honored in the position where sits Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. President, since it is plain that foreign trade cannot be looked to to repair the losses of our country, and that the farmer from his farm and the manufacturer from his factory must wait only in hope, but not be able to realize in the present a return sufficient either to increase his business or to repair his losses, we turn to ask, What other steps can be taken?

The trade of this country is about 90 percent the result either of the industry of the manufacturer or of the farmer; and since there is so little to be hoped for immediately from the export trade against which foreign countries are now leveling their cannon of legislation and rearing their barriers of obstruction, we are confronted with the query, What can be done as to the domestic trade in order to help the citizen at home in his local pursuits?

If continuous production in any line, either on the farm or in the factory, shall continue to result in a surplus beyond the capacity of the people to purchase, and then result concomitantly in very low prices to be obtained by those who do produce, the conclusion can be but one, in the final analysis—a loss to those who produce and, therefore, an inability on the part of those who would consume to purchase.

How shall this be remedied? There is a bill before this body spoken of as the "cotton bill." I am not an expert upon the subject in its relation to the farm or the factory. True, I was reared in the State of Georgia, a cotton-producing State, and am not without some knowledge of the problems of the South, and great sympathy for their miseries and that which they have had to endure in their losses and in their despair. But I speak rather upon the general subject. Shall there not be some step accepted by our country whereby we may limit production in order that, as a result of that limitation, there shall be a market for that which is produced, and that market at such a price as will give such profit or compensation to the producer as will induce him to continue to produce and will give him compensation for his undertaking? In the meantime, does not that also produce the result that that which he obtains from his product becomes that with which he buys other products, and he becomes the consumer? More people are put to toil, and more wages are given to the toiler.

It may be that there are some who are not occupying themselves in the same pursuit in a manner as before; but as nature gives us equality that enables us to repair our misfortunes, it may be trusted that those who temporarily are suspended from employment, or from its pursuit, will find something else that will become their life in their undertaking or become their habit in nature, and in the final end no great loss will transpire.

The measure presented by the eminent representative of the crop from the South, cotton, deals with a very serious question, the seriousness of which the world little realizes. Cotton heretofore has been produced largely in the South. It has had a very large trade abroad. As I remarked a while ago, if I may be pardoned the personal reference, I have my interest in the South, where my forefathers have lived for generations, and where I lived in my childhood and in my youth. I know its problems as a cotton-producing section. As I traveled across Egypt, I realized the widening domain that was awakening as a competitor to the South. Then in Australia I beheld the rapid growth of their farms, and the multiplication of the land areas wherein cotton is produced. Then I returned with great gladness to see in our own great country in the West a new production of this great staple. As I saw all this, I marveled that the southern planter who produces cotton does not realize how very great is his peril and that, if something is not done that shall limit his production and place him upon the same paying market, there is no recourse for him beyond bankruptcy. That means the abandonment of his farm. It means a loss of comfort and dignity. His children will become wanderers and wayfarers wherever they may go, to city or to country.

This illustration which I draw is applicable to every other form of production in the land and justifies the new departure upon which we are now entering—of some form of control of production in order that the production that may come forth may have compensation and lend encouragement to other producers, and that new fields of operation may be found to make up whatever may be lost temporarily so that disadvantage shall not come from that which is withheld.

Mr. President, I rise to ask whether there ever has been a time in the emergencies of any country when its citizens have not had to surrender a temporary advantage in order to avoid suffering from a greater and multiplied disadvantage?

Caesar is descending upon Rome. The imperial city is crowded with the thousands who come down from the hills, whom history records in a single expression as "the Goths and the Vandals", who in after times became possessed of the government. This eminent soldier, who had also written his Commentaries with the aid of his secretaries, saw that the necessity at first was to provide something for the farmer whose corn was losing markets. He also saw to it that the one whom we now speak of as the weaver, who with magic fingers in different forms of necromancy produces the results which we speak of as carpeting, literally of the earth, and the metal worker, and others, were all placed under a form of industrial operation such as we speak of today as the code. A form of limitation by the order of this great general and administrator was placed upon products, and it gave to Rome her chance to reestablish herself, by which she became the competitor of Egypt, and avoided the Egyptians overrunning her, and saved herself from destruction, and enabled the great poet to write of—

The glory that was Greece
And the grandeur that was Rome.

Mr. President, we turn to contemplate for a moment the condition that came upon England after she ceased to be under Gaul. When it was discovered that the wool from her farms could not have an outlet, France having placed a barrier growing out of previous wars, England did not hesitate to adopt, through the strategy of her statesmen and the wisdom of her philosophers, a system that placed a limitation upon the products which came from her soil as well as those which came from industry. A market price was secured, and something was had in that which went forward to her neighboring lands, which we speak of as exports.

It cannot be lost to the memory that as the manufacturers came along in Germany and Germany became a great manufacturing country and the supreme quality of her mechanical arts became recognized by the other nations of the world, Germany summoned the master minds of the fine portions of her land, which were not then an empire, and submitted to them a proposition for lessening manufacturing, giving as a reason, among others, the absence of coal sufficient to justify those exaggerated and enlarged undertakings. In this manner Germany began to build a market. She secured profits to her own people, gains to her country, and welfare to her citizens, which induced her to advance farther; and then she began the very first definite move out to that portion of the world of which she subsequently became a colonizer, known as "West and Central Africa."

I mention these incidents—not unfamiliar, of course, to the Senators who do me the honor to hear my observations—merely that it may be seen that what has been undertaken here in behalf of cotton, one of the prime crops of our country, is no novelty in the creation of man, and is now being presented to meet a necessity very like that which has faced other countries of the earth, and which they have met in similar manner.

We turn, of course, now and then for solace to Ecclesiastes, where it was said by the author that he beheld under the sun nothing new.

Mr. President, that for which I ask consideration is not primarily the cotton bill. I do not speak to the bill other than in its general terms. I beg to advise the Senate, however, that the example being set here must be followed as to all other products in America at this particular time, or there will arise from every portion of the country a demand that that be done. I now advert particularly to the imperial West, of which I am one of the voices; and in order that it may have an example which may guide it along the road looking to its protection and to the preservation of its people, I am pleased to point for justification to the bill presented by the Senator from Alabama in behalf of this great crop, cotton, and what the advocates of the bill feel will be its successful result.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to know if we are to gather from the Senator's remarks that the American Republic in the year 1934 is to look to the European monarchies of the sixteenth century for an example.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer that whenever an example has been set to mankind, and mankind has profited by it, and it parallels in its exact experience that of today, it is an example to be followed, and one that it would be profitable to follow, although I must say to my able friend from North Carolina that it is not necessary to return to them. I merely call to the attention of my able friend and the Senators about me how the views expressed here today in behalf of the bill called the "cotton bill" are not original, but similar utterances have been previously made in connection with just such emergencies as that which confronts our land today.

I rather would invite my able friend's attention to the point I prefer to stress and that is, that when the President of the United States finds it necessary, in obedience to what he feels is the will of the people, as expressed to him through the ballot box, to order or request his congressional aids to consider legislation of this form as that which can repair the losses and meet the conditions of distress, that he may alleviate them and wholly restore our country's prosperity, we should turn to realize that the President's order and request to the body is a mere compliance with the order he has obtained from the ballot box when he was placed in power. We should realize that he is fulfilling a trust; and we, the Congress, his colleagues, should consider that we too owe an obligation to the country of fulfilling the order of the ballot box in compliance with the requests of the President wherever we can do so without complete violation of conscience, or what we feel is a deliberate assault upon the interests and welfare of the country.

Mr. President, I particularly desire to stress that it is not sufficient as a justification for our opposition that we ourselves individually may feel that the President is wrong. The President of the United States, coming directly from the people, has the right to be wrong. He may be wrong according to the estimate of some other man; he may be wrong according to the measure of some other community; but if he is fulfilling the directions of the people who placed him in office, at the same time giving him instructions as to the method of relief they seek, however wrong it may appear to be to the individual here and there, whose private fortune or personal interests it may affect, that cannot be a justification for opposition to the measure. The measure has a right to have its trial and its experiment to be explored in order to test its efficacy.

I, therefore, merely rise to call attention, sir, that conditions in our country and countries abroad call for action by us, not so much, sir, merely to fulfill a hope that there may be a restoration of exports through some adjustment between ourselves and foreign countries as to announce that that hope is so far from realization, and before it can be reached in its undertaking will have so many obstructions from statesmen who may honestly differ as to processes and from a public that may oppose the measures undertaken, that in the meantime our first obligation is to consider conditions at home, to ascertain what may be done to secure the market at home, and give relief to our own producers of farm and factory. So whatever the limitations of the measure now proposed in the application of the remedies it suggests, as an example, sir, I give it my approval because I find it tends in the direction of the current program of relief to America, if America is to enjoy such in the present era. I thank the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who opened the debate, and who is the author of the pending measure, indicated in his remarks that as it affects a local problem and a local question, those representing that section of the country should be permitted, in a large measure, to have the approval of those who come from other sections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Erickson in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am quite sure the Senator from Idaho will recall that during the course of my discussion I pointed out the very great direct interest all the industries of this country have in this program, and also, from my standpoint, its effect on the welfare of the people at large.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say, Mr. President, that if this measure affected solely and alone the region of country in which cotton is produced, I think we would all be disposed to accept the judgment of those from that section, for there is no group of men in this body who know better the problems of their own particular locality and are more capable of presenting them than those who represent the States where cotton is grown. If this measure in any sense could be confined in its effect and operation to the South, or to that portion of the country where cotton is grown, I certainly should not take the time of the Senate in discussing it. But it is a measure which involves, first, a very grave constitutional question, and secondly, the establishment of what may be considered a national policy. Undoubtedly, as indicated just now by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis], if applied to cotton, it must inevitably find its way to other portions of the country and control the production of other crops. Therefore, in discussing this measure we are not in any sense at all impeaching or controverting the ability of those who are especially familiar with the cotton situation to represent the views of the cotton growers.

Mr. President, there is a constitutional question here involved, but I am not going to discuss it at length. I am not going to discuss it at length for the reason that, in my judgment, it presents no graver question of constitutional law than other measures which the Congress has passed with reference to national recovery. I have felt that a number of provisions in the Agricultural Adjustment Act run distinctly counter to the plain provisions of the Constitution, and while I have felt, and now feel, that there are provisions in the National Recovery Act equally objectionable, the courts have not as yet passed upon them. If the courts should sustain them, this bill, in my judgment, would have to be accepted under the principles which would be announced in order to sustain provisions of the other measures.

Therefore, I do not feel disposed to discuss the constitutional question, further than to explain my personal view and in a sense to explain my vote. It is admitted by the terms of the bill and in the discussion on the floor that we are dealing with a product which is not in interstate commerce; under the decisions of the Supreme Court in no sense could it be regarded as interstate commerce. I do not believe that the able Senator himself who spoke in behalf of his bill would undertake to maintain that the interstate-commerce clause would justify this measure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether the distinguished and able Senator from Idaho heard my full discussion on Saturday, but, whether he did or not, permit me to point out to him at this time that it is likely that a greater proportion of cotton and the manufactured products of cotton within the States where cotton is grown move in interstate and foreign commerce than any other commodity produced in America.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; that will be conceded, Mr. President, but it does not in any way change the principle of law which I have announced, because until it does begin to move in interstate commerce it is not subject to the will of Congress or to the legislative power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The fact that it may move at some time in interstate commerce is not sufficient to authorize Congress to legislate concerning the commodity under the commerce clause of the Constitution. I need not cite decisions to sustain that principle of constitutional law. So long as it is intrastate as a commodity, so long as it is not in the channels of interstate trade, it cannot be legislated upon by the Congress, although it may thereafter, at some time or other, move in its entirety in interstate commerce. Clearly the measure itself discloses that we are dealing with this product before it enters interstate commerce, and, indeed, we are attempting by the terms of the measure itself to prevent its going into interstate commerce, that is, that portion of it as to which we propose to legislate.

Mr. President, I do not think that the taxing power can be invoked to sustain this measure. The only decision which has been called to our attention which would apparently sustain the view that this bill is within the taxing power of Congress is that in the oleomargarine case, and I do not believe that case in any sense announces a principle which would justify the measure which is now before us. It must be borne in mind that there the Congress was dealing with a commodity known as "oleomargarine" and seeking to distinguish it from butter, and by the exercise of its power laid a tax on oleomargarine. I think the Court went to the limit in sustaining that law. But suppose, instead of its having dealt with oleomargarine in contradistinction to butter, it had dealt with butter solely, and had undertaken to impose a tax upon pure butter in excess of a certain quantity of butter produced; that would be this bill; and that is not the measure upon which the Court passed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator what he has to say about the bank-note tax, which prevented entirely the issuance of bank notes by the State banks? I refer to the Veazie case.

Mr. BORAH. The Congress of the United States is given express power with reference to money and the establishment of a monetary system, and the Court undertook to sustain the act referred to upon that theory.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It sustained, however, as I think the Senator will admit, the tax regardless of the other theory.

Mr. BORAH. It sustained the tax because the Court found special provision in the Constitution authorizing the Congress to deal with the entire subject matter; and the Congress, having power to deal with the subject matter in any respect, had the power to deal with it as an entirety and completely; it might do whatever the Congress thought was sufficient and efficient to establish a proper monetary or banking system in the United States.

If the effect of the establishment of that system was to prevent the States from having a certain monetary system, it was perfectly legitimate, for the reason that the power was originally lodged with Congress to treat with the entire subject; and that is not the principle with which we are here dealing.

It must be borne in mind that this decision, the Oleomargarine case, was by a divided court. In the decision it is stated:

As we have said, it has been conclusively settled by this Court that the tendency of that article to deceive the public into buying it for butter is such that the States may, in the exertion of their police powers, without violating the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment, absolutely prohibit the manufacture of the article. It hence results that, even although it be true that the effect of the tax in question is to repress the manufacture of artificially colored oleomargarine, it cannot be said that such repression destroys rights which no free government could destroy, and therefore no ground exists to sustain the proposition that the judiciary may invoke an implied prohibition upon the theory that to do so is essential to save such rights from destruction.

We are dealing here with a perfectly legitimate commodity, with a perfectly legitimate article of trade and commerce. It is not deleterious; it is not obnoxious to the public interest; it is not deceptive; there is no fraud connected with it in any way; but here is a legitimate subject of trade and commerce. Now, I ask, can the Congress of the United States, under the guise of laying a tax, prohibit the shipment of a perfectly legitimate subject of trade in interstate commerce? Has it ever been done? We have prohibited the sending of lottery tickets through the mails; we have prohibited the carrying of women across State lines for illicit purposes; we have taxed oleomargarine because of the deception and the fraud which it works; we have taken hold of those subjects which in some way were injurious, or were thought to be injurious to the public, and either through a special provision of one kind or another we have undertaken to control and limit action in regard to them.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment.

But, as said by the Supreme Court in a case which I shall read in a few moments, to concede to the Congress the power by its own interdiction to prohibit a perfectly legitimate product of commerce to enter into interstate trade is to take away the very foundation of the Government itself.

I yield now to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator is quoting from the opinion in McCray against United States, involving the oleomargarine case, reported in One Hundred and Ninety-fifth United States Reports?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I was quoting from that.

Mr. HEBERT. I invite the attention of the Senator to the last paragraph in that decision which to my mind is a very strong argument against the principle involved in the pending bill.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am going to read that now:

Let us concede that if a case was presented where the abuse of the taxing power was so extreme as to be beyond the principles which we have previously stated, and where it was plain to the judicial mind that the power had been called into play not for revenue but solely for the purpose of destroying rights which could not be rightfully destroyed consistently with the principles of freedom and justice upon which the Constitution rests, that it would be the duty of the courts to say that such an arbitrary act was not merely an abuse of a delegated power, but was the exercise of an authority not conferred.

The Senator from Alabama by his bill is saying to the small farmer of the South that he shall produce only a small amount of cotton or, if he produces more, he shall not be permitted to ship it in interstate commerce. What is the matter with that cotton? Why not permit it to be shipped in interstate commerce? The cotton is inherently sound. It is a legitimate article of trade. It is proposed that we shall use the taxing power to preclude a citizen of the United States from enjoying the right to sell his property in the ordinary course of trade. My own view is that we have no such power. That a measure which purports to do that thing not only is without authority of the Constitution but runs counter to the most fundamental principles of free government.

As I said a moment ago I do not say that the Court will not sustain the bill. I do not know what that tribunal will do. If they should sustain other provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, I think this bill would have to be sustained. I am simply recording my own view which must be my guide in casting my vote. I must construe the Constitution myself for myself in voting on measures here. And I entertain no doubt as to the unconstitutional import of this bill. I can find no possible justification for the exercise of the taxing power to keep out of trade a legitimate subject of commerce. It is not imposing a tax for revenue, it is assessing a fine under the guise of a tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. While the Senator has before him the McCray case, from which he is reading, I invite his attention to page 60, near the bottom of the page, to a proposition which is fully supported by this decision from the very first statement in it to the last:

The proposition that where a tax is imposed which is within the grant of powers—

I assume that no one disputes the right of Congress to levy an excise tax—the proposition that where a tax is imposed which is within the grant of powers, and which does not conflict with any express constitutional limitation, the courts may hold the tax to be void because it is deemed that the tax is too high, is absolutely disposed of by the opinions in the cases hitherto cited, and which expressly hold, to repeat again the language of one of the cases (Spencer against Merchant) that "The judicial department cannot prescribe to the legislative department limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts but to the people by whom its members are elected."

Mr. BORAH. I do not dispute the proposition the Senator states at all. There is no argument about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That goes to the proposition the Senator has been arguing.

Mr. BORAH. No; it does not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has been arguing that a tax laid upon an article which may move in interstate commerce, or that the Senator insists does not but may move in interstate commerce, is an undue burden and interference with interstate commerce. Here a tax was laid upon oleomargarine that was unjust, an excise tax. Nobody disputes it. But the principle of the power to levy the tax, whether upon colored or uncolored oleomargarine, is unquestioned, and the amount of the tax under this decision cannot be questioned by the courts.

Mr. BORAH. In order that the Senator and I may not take our time in controverting things about which we agree, I concede that if the Congress has the power, then the Court cannot restrain the exercise of that power to whatever extent the Congress may choose to go. We are now discussing the question of whether or not the Congress has the power, through the guise of taxation or otherwise, to prohibit the shipment in interstate trade of a pure, unadulterated, legitimate subject of commerce and trade. That is the subject I am discussing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the Senator addressing himself to unconstitutionality of the bill? I understood he was not going to do that.

Mr. BORAH. I have stated that I simply desire to state my position regarding it, and I do not propose to take much time of the Senate in further discussing it.

I call attention to one sentence which I think is important. Speaking of the power to regulate commerce—and it would be the same, in my judgment, in reference to taxation—the Court said in the Dagenhart case:

The power conferred is to regulate, and the very terms of the grant would seem to repel the contention that only prohibition of movement in interstate commerce was embraced. And the cogency of this is manifest, since if the doctrine were applied to those manifold and important subjects of interstate commerce as to which Congress from the beginning has regulated, not prohibited, the existence of government under the Constitution would be no longer possible.

Is it contended that the Congress of the United States has the power, by taxation or otherwise, to prohibit any legitimate subject of trade that it sees fit to prohibit?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that question addressed to me?

Mr. BORAH. It is addressed to the country. Has the Congress of the United States the power under the Constitution to say to a man who has 10 bales of cotton, "You may not ship that cotton in interstate commerce"? I think it is a very, very extraordinary power.

I read a paragraph from the child-labor tax case, and then I shall pass from this constitutional question:

Or does it regulate by the use of the so-called "tax" as a penalty?

I call particular attention to this matter:

If it were an excise on a commodity or other thing of value, we might not be permitted under previous decisions of this Court to infer solely from its heavy burden that the act intends a prohibition instead of a tax. But this act is more. It provides a heavy exaction for a departure from a detailed and specified course of conduct in business. That course of business is that employers shall employ in mines and quarries children of an age greater than 16 years; in mills and factories, children of an age greater than 14 years; and shall prevent children of less than 16 years in mills and factories from working more than 8 hours a day or 6 days in the week. If an employer departs from this prescribed course of business, he is to pay to the Government 0.1 of his entire net income in the business for a full year.

It was held that that tax was void; that that could not be done under the guise of the taxing clause.

Mr. President, I say that when the authorities find that the party is proposing to ship in interstate commerce above a certain amount allotted to him and that there is assessed against him a tax of 50 percent of the value, that is manifestly on the face of it a punishment for the doing of a legitimate thing, and it seems to me that it is indefensible.

Mr. President, it has been said that the southern cotton planters are all in favor of the bill, that 90 percent of them are in favor of it. I do not believe 10 percent of the cotton planters of the South are in favor of this bill. They are in favor of a higher price for their cotton, and undoubtedly they would be in favor of any reasonable attempt to control the production of cotton. But when we consider the terms of the bill, the penalties which are assessed, and the fact that a man may be sent to prison for violating a regulation of the Department of Agriculture in a legitimate occupation which he has pursued for half a century or less, I do not believe the people would accept any such proposition.

I do not know, of course, just what the number of people is who are opposed to the bill. I know it is very large. I do know the southern people. I admire the southern character. I do not know of any people who desire more freedom, more independence, more liberty to pursue their legitimate rights without embarrassment than the people of the South. I do not believe any people on the round globe are so free of the taint of Communism. I doubt very much if anyone will ever be able to get them to accept a strait-jacket like this.

Let us read the bill, a most extraordinary measure, it seems to me. Even if we concede the purpose to be legitimate, yet the terms and conditions of the bill are exceptional:

When the Secretary of Agriculture finds for the crop year 1935-36 that two thirds of the persons who own, rent, share-crop, or control land in the United States on which cotton is produced favor a levy of a tax on the ginning of cotton in excess of an allotment made to meet the probable market requirements and determines that such a tax is required to carry out the policy declared in section 1, the Secretary shall ascertain from an investigation of the available supply of cotton and the probable market requirements the quantity of cotton that should be allotted, in accordance with the policy declared in section 1, for marketing in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, from production of cotton during the succeeding cotton crop year, exempt from the payment of taxes thereon.

What happens? The taxes are laid as a result of a popular vote, as it were. We are not levying the tax ourselves. We are giving to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to levy the tax, and the Secretary of Agriculture cannot exercise the power until he has taken a plebiscite of the voters. Thus the power to levy a tax is to be twice removed from the body which alone has that power.

For the crop year 1934-35, 10,000,000 bales is hereby fixed as the maximum amount of cotton of the crop harvested in the crop year 1934-35, that may be marketed exempt from payment of the tax herein levied. Except as provided in section 2, the allotment plan and the tax is hereby declared to be in effect for the crop year 1934-35.

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby levied and assessed on the ginning of cotton hereafter harvested during a crop year with respect to which this act is in effect, a tax at the rate per pound of the lint cotton produced from ginning, of 50 percent of the average central market price per pound of lint cotton, but in no event less than 5 cents per pound.

Is that a tax, or is that a fine? When a man has a certain number of bales of cotton which may go into interstate commerce, and we find that he has a bale of cotton which may not go into interstate commerce, and we tax him 50 percent of the value of the product, is that a fine? Is that a punishment or is that a tax? Is it laid for the purpose of collecting revenue, or is it laid for the purpose of punishing a man for exercising his legitimate rights and pursuing a legitimate industry?

On the face of the matter, when the court comes to speak of this bill, it will say that the objective sought is that of punishment of the person who undertakes to engage in interstate commerce.

If the cotton was harvested during a crop year with respect to which the tax is in effect, the tax shall apply even if the ginning occurs after the expiration of such crop year.

Now we come to the punitive provisions of the bill:

Except as may be permitted by regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, with due regard for the protection of the revenue, no person shall (1) transport, except for storing or warehousing, under the provisions of section 4 (f) beyond the boundaries of the county where produced any lint cotton to which a bale tag issued under this act is not attached.

What are we doing here? We are prohibiting internal transportation. We are saying that a man shall not ship from one county to another without the consent of the National Government. I do not believe it will be contended that that is valid.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I assume the Senator understands that that relates only to cotton upon which the Government has a lien for a tax which has not been paid.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I understand that. The bill goes on:

Or (2) sell, purchase, or open any bale of lint cotton to which a bale tag issued under this act is not attached.

That does not change the principle which I was undertaking to express, it seems to me.

(d) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this act, or who willfully fails to pay, when due, any tax imposed under this act, or who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes, forges, alters, or counterfeits any bale tag or certificate of exemption made or used under this act, or who uses, sells, or has in his possession any such forged, altered, or counterfeited bale tag or certificate of exemption, or any plate or die used, or which may be used in the manufacture thereof, or has in his possession only bale tag which should have been destroyed as required by this act, or who makes, uses, sells, or has in his possession any paper in imitation of the paper used in the manufacture of any such bale tag or certificate of exemption, or who reuses any bale tag required to be destroyed by this act, or who places any cotton in any bale which has been filled and stamped, tagged, or otherwise identified under this act, without destroying the bale tag previously affixed to such bale, or who affixes any bale tag issued under this act to any bale of lint cotton on which any tax due is unpaid, or who makes any false statement in any application for bale tags or certificates of exemption under this act, or who has in his possession any such bale tags or certificates of exemption obtained by him otherwise than as provided in this act, shall on conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 1 year, or both.

There are some things in that provision for which I think it would be perfectly proper to inflict punishment. If a person is guilty of fraud, or guilty of deception, or guilty of forgery, or anything of that kind, undoubtedly the Congress has a right to fine him a thousand dollars, or any other reasonable amount that the Congress sees fit; but the bill says:

Any person * * * who willfully fails to pay when due any tax imposed under this act.

In other words, if a person is unable to meet his obligations and declines to pay, or refuses to pay, does he not do it willfully or purposely?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator will find, if he will examine the measure, that the tax is not due until the producer sells the cotton. If any tax at all is due under the proposed statute the Senator is criticizing, it is not due until the producer sells the cotton, because there is no tax due on reserved cotton. If he removes or disposes of the other cotton, there is no tax due on it until he sells it, and then, of course, he has the money out of which to pay the tax. If he puts the money in his pocket and goes off and deprives the Government of the tax, I do not think the punishment is too severe; but if the Senator thinks it is, I am perfectly willing to modify it. I just want to make the law effective, that is all.

Mr. BORAH. The bill says:

(e) Any person who willfully violates any regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury under this act * * * shall * * * be punished by a fine not exceeding $200.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is taken from the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It has been in effect now for a year, and I have not heard of anybody improperly being sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. BORAH. No; and I do not think the Senator ever will, because I think the authorities are afraid to test it. Ever since I have been in the Senate, however, I have been protesting against making the violation of a regulation promulgated by a Cabinet officer a crime. A man ought not to be convicted of crime for violating anything less than the law made by the lawmaking body of the United States, or of the State, if the transaction be within a State.

I said a moment ago that I do not think the South as a whole, or the small planters of the South, are in favor of this bill; and I do not think they are. I have here a letter from North Carolina which says:

If you will go into the history of all the men visiting in Washington urging the above legislation, you will find that most of them are landowners who have overproduced for years and therefore are fully protected under the proposed bills.

I will hand these letters to the author of the bill if he desires to see them.

I have a telegram this morning reading as follows:

Please vote against Bankhead bill. Small cotton farmers oppose it. Will ruin dairy and livestock industry in South, where feed is already scarce and high. Farmers' endorsement obtained by high-pressure methods through professional agriculture bureaucrats.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator to read again the part of that letter which says that the passage of the bill would ruin the dairy interests of the South—for what reason?

Mr. BORAH. I read it just as it is written here.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but I ask the Senator if he will read it again.

Mr. BORAH. The writer of the letter says:

Please vote against Bankhead bill. Small cotton farmers oppose it. Will ruin dairy and livestock industry in South.

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me that is a contradiction in terms, if the Senator will realize that on the land which the Government rents, which has been taken out of production under this voluntary reduction program, an abundance of feed and food for cattle can be raised. So it seems to me that instead of injuring the dairy industry, the passage of this bill would be the very source of promoting it.

Mr. BORAH. Southern Congressmen who know more about this matter, of course, than I do—not more than the Senator from South Carolina does—took the same position in the debate in the House.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; some few of them.

Will the Senator allow me here to repeat what I said last Saturday? The Secretary of Agriculture informs us that he sent out questionnaires along the line of the voluntary entrance into binding contracts by farmers to reduce their acreage. He sent questionnaires to those who had entered into the voluntary reduction program, and asked them how they felt in this emergency toward the Congress, passing a compulsory act looking toward making absolutely certain the amount to which they were trying to reduce their production; and according to a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture a tremendous majority of the cotton producers—and those were the smaller ones—answered in the affirmative.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps some of them were like this gentleman, who writes me, speaking of the bill, as follows:

It will not be any good for us little fellows. We have been made to endorse the bill, but we do not want it. We little fellows will get the worst hurt by it. We want you to do everything you can against it.

Mr. SMITH. The little fellow is the very one who will get the benefit of it, as a matter of course, because in the voluntary reduction plan he was the very one who was taken care of better than the larger one.

Mr. BORAH. There is a difference of opinion about that, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and there is a difference of method of getting this propaganda to us. When the Senator stops to think that a ginner gets the same amount for ginning cotton whether the price is 5 cents or 50 cents, he will realize that what he is after is the number of bales to gin. The man who operates the compress gets the same, whether the price is 5 cents or 50 cents a pound. What he wants is bales. The same freight is paid, whether the price is high or low.

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the Senator wanted some enlightenment from those who do know the problem. I agree with the Senator, if he will allow me to make this statement:

I am no more in favor of this interference by the Federal Government in the internal affairs of a State than the Senator from Idaho is; but conditions arise, and this is one, where a majority have entered into a voluntary reduction which may be defeated by seasons or by the 15 percent who have not come in.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina spoke of the reduction of the cotton crop and how that had benefited the small cotton producer. I read from a southern newspaper, the Tulsa Tribune, which says:

The Tribune said of the "plow up" cotton program, which is popularly supposed to have been born in the fertile brain of a Columbia University professor who probably never saw a cotton farmer, exactly what Norman Thomas said of it at Tyronza, Ark., last week. We said it was crazy economics. That is what it is. Cotton growers who do not have a whole pair of overalls or whose children do not have enough clothes to cover their nakedness have been bullied into plowing up their cotton and signing crop-reduction agreements. Landlords have taken land away from their tenants, in order to obtain the Government bonus, and left them with no means of support. Such a program is not only crazy economics but is viciously unjust. It is a thing that no American citizen should countenance.

There is, to be sure, more money circulating in the cotton country. But a miracle would have to be worked to entitle the program to the support of anybody who knows actual conditions. For every cotton farmer who has been given relief a dozen have been penalized.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, from what paper is the Senator reading?

Mr. BORAH. The Tulsa Tribune.

Mr. SMITH. That is from out in Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. I will not take the Senator's time; but in my own time I shall prove to him that the reduction program did not reduce the production of cotton by the farmer by 1 pound or 1 ounce, because the Government substituted out of the carry-over, pound for pound, and even more than the farmer would have produced had he planted the acreage which he abandoned. Where he did not elect to make cotton the Government paid the tenant, the share-cropper, for the acreage. The statement read by the Senator is an infamous misrepresentation of the facts, as I know, because I went all over my State and found that every tenant got his pro-rata share of the benefits.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield to permit the insertion after the Senator's remarks of an article from the Manning News, of South Carolina, which gives information along the line of that the Senator from Idaho is giving?

Mr. SMITH. I am perfectly familiar with the man who writes for that paper, too?

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to have this inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection, if it is inserted at the close of my remarks.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD this article from the Manning (S.C.) Times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. SMITH. I shall take occasion to answer that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. If any Senator desires to interrupt him, he should address the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to quote from an article in the Texas Weekly, January 20, 1934, page 4, where it is said:

[From the Texas Weekly, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1934]

THE CRIME OF AN EXTRA BALE—BANKHEAD BILL, IF ENACTED INTO LAW, WOULD MEAN GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF THE FARMER'S LAND, HIS IMPLEMENTS, AND EVEN OF THE FARMER HIMSELF. FINE OR IMPRISONMENT PROVIDED

Believe it or not, there is now pending in Congress a bill which provides that the Secretary of Agriculture "shall apportion to each farm the number of bales of cotton for which license to gin will be issued", and which also provides that any person who "violates any of the provisions of this act or regulations shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than 60 days", and that "each bale of cotton ginned without a producer's license shall be a separate offense." The bill is known as the "Bankhead bill", having been introduced by Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, and it is said to have powerful support.

The bill would make it the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture each year to ascertain, from investigation of the available supply of cotton and probable market requirements, the quantity of cotton "should be offered for sale in markets from production of cotton during the succeeding crop year." Then the Secretary "shall apportion to cotton-producing States the number of standard bales of 500 pounds weight that may be ginned in each State" and the apportionment of each State shall be apportioned to each farm in the State. "A license shall be issued for each bale allotted a landowner under such regulations relating to overweights as the Secretary may make." And no farmer will be permitted to have ginned a single bale of cotton for which he has no license. The proposal is that a new crime be created, the crime of the extra bale! Incidentally the bill provides arbitrarily that "for the crop year 1934-35 the quantity of cotton for which licenses to gin may be issued shall not exceed 9,000,000 bales."

The bill has been changed so as to make that 10,000,000 bales.

Discussing this extraordinary measure in its issue of last Tuesday, the Dallas News says: "The introduction into Congress of such a measure as the Bankhead control bill is not startling. No measure merely introduced into Congress startles anyone any more. But the report that administration leaders are supporting the bill is a little breathtaking to Americans who still think straight according to the old American ideals. If the Government can control 'down to each plot of ground' the production of cotton, then the Government can—and inevitably will—control all crop and livestock production on all plots of ground. When the Government does this, it has taken over ownership of the farmer's land and implements and the farmer himself. What does title to property mean without the right to manage it? What does freedom mean without the liberty to direct one's productive efforts according to one's own ideas of economic self-interest, excepting for moral restraint?"

Mr. President, that paragraph discloses the reason for my keen interest in this bill. I think I know that if this bill shall be enacted and control is taken of cotton, wheat areas will be subjected to the same principle and the same rule, the cattle industry will be subjected to the same rule, and all the industries of the country will be subject to the plan and management and control indicated in the pending bill.

I could very well forego any discussion of a measure which related solely to one locality or portion of the country, although I would have some difficulty in convincing myself that this measure would be of any benefit to the cotton raiser; but I am interested for the reason that, as has been indicated by those in authority, this is the beginning of a national plan and is the start of a movement which has for its objective and purpose the planning and controlling of the productive forces of this country as an entirety.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Does not the Senator know that the farm-animal industry has already been taken possession of, and that several million sows have already been slaughtered to keep them from having pigs?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I do know that. And I cannot believe in any such program.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know why they should have made that discrimination against the sow.

Mr. SMITH. It was against the pig.

Mr. BORAH. This writer further says:

"The enactment of the Bankhead bill", the News continues, "would be a long step to the left, and it would make necessary further steps in the same direction, because it would make Government permanently responsible for many inequitable and oppressive conditions in the current economic problem. It would freeze laissez faire at its lowest and worst and leave the thawing to bureaucracy. What, for example, would the Government do about the problem of the big landowner and producer? What would it do about the millions of tenants? When the Government has taken out of the farmer's hands the running of his farm, will it take over the responsibility of the mortgage? In justice it will have to do so."

"There is strong support for the Bankhead bill, according to report," says the News, "and yet there would be more bellowing on Capitol Hill than has been heard in a decade if someone should even hint that there is one Communist among Congressmen. Whether the Bankhead bill be communistic or State syndicalistic, it is unreasonably radical. The American people have accepted extreme measures as a way out of the depression, but they are not yet willing to see individual economic enterprise become the vassal of bureaucracy. They have not given up the idea that democracy in its essentials may be restored—and the Bankhead bill is not the way back to democracy."

All of which we unhesitatingly endorse. But there are practical arguments against the measure also. First of all, in the face of the cotton plan for 1934 which is being put in effect by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration such a measure is unnecessary. The new contracts are being signed by cotton producers throughout the South, and within another 10 days it is expected that agreements will have been reached for the retirement of enough land to hold the total cotton acreage down to 25,000,000 acres. An average yield of 180 pounds to the acre on that acreage would mean a 9,000,000-bale crop, and only on two occasions since the World War, besides last season, was there an average yield of as much as 180 pounds to the acre. An ordinary growing year would mean a total production of much less than 9,000,000 bales. And it would require an average price of 14.6 cents a pound to make a 9,000,000-bale crop produce a money return equivalent to that of the past season's crop.

Another practical argument against allotting a certain number of bales to each farm is that it would promote expensive production, because the average farmer would make sure of producing his allotment by planting a maximum of acreage necessary to the production of that amount of cotton. The result would be that a large percentage of the cotton farmers would produce more than the allotment, thus creating waste and running up the cost of producing that covered by the ginning license.

However, as suggested by the News, the chief objection to the measure is that it would mean practical Government ownership of the farmer's land and tools and of the farmer himself. Also it would accentuate existing inequalities, giving an immense advantage to the owner of a large tract of land and working a serious hardship on the owner of a small tract on which even a maximum production would mean only a bare subsistence return.

It is to be hoped that the reports that have come from Washington to the effect that this measure has the support of administration leaders are without adequate foundation in fact. The present cotton plan is bad enough without such a measure as the Bankhead bill.

I presume it must be conceded that this bill is supposed to take care only of a very small minority. It is for the purpose of punishing some individual or a small minority who may not have joined in the reduction plan which has heretofore been obtaining. Certainly, if the consent were unanimous among the cotton producers, there would be no occasion for the bill, and it is therefore really an attempt to coerce the last single individual into producing cotton in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. President, on page 10 of the issue of the Texas Weekly of February 3, 1934, there are quoted a number of paragraphs from different newspapers of the South. Without taking the time to read them, I ask that I may have them inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit B.)

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have said all I wished to say in regard to the bill. I desired merely to explain my reason for voting against the measure and to be prepared against another day in case a similar movement should be proposed as against the wheat acreage of the United States and in relation to other products about which I have more immediate concern and about which I have greater knowledge. I could not under the circumstances sit silent and in a sense be estopped from offering my views later.

EXHIBIT A

[From the Manning (S.C.) Times]

All right, here we are and we are tempted to say something about the cotton-reduction plan as outlined by those in authority, while we think it a fine idea to get the supply in line with the demand, but we are wondering if we are not going too strong with the reduction to meet the situation desired. Suppose we get this year's crop down to 8 to 10 million bales, and the price gets up to 20 cents the pound, will the majority be benefited or a minority? To illustrate, those who have for all these many years looked to the fall of the year to make their money to supply themselves with clothing and shoes and enough groceries to carry them through the winter will be disappointed; then, too, here is another fact that we cannot get around, and that is this: With high prices of raw cotton, naturally we are going to have high prices to pay for the manufactured goods from the raw material. Still further, we cannot get away from another fact, and that is these millions upon top of millions of dollars are invested in cotton ginning and cotton oil-mill machinery that is going to be frozen investments; then, too, let us not forget the further fact that, with short-term ginning and short-term operating of the oil mills that leads to unemployment, the very thing that the United States Government is spending even billions of dollars right now to hedge off; and, still further in our humble opinion, there is another situation that should be thought about by those in authority and that is engineering his reduction game, and that is much foodstuff in the way of hulls and cottonseed meal for cattle will be taken off the market, and then shortening for mankind also is cut off; as to just what it is all about remains yet to be seen. Then there is still another fact, and that is that thousands upon thousands of cotton buyers, saying the least of it, term for work is going to be cut short, and the thousands of people that are now working to bring about this reduction will have to continue in the service of the Government, as we see it, to a very large extent to see that the program now being put on is carried out. The pay must come from somewhere, cotton or otherwise, and our opinion is that Government employees are reasonably well paid, saying the least of it. While we hope that we are mistaken as to the above, and that it will prove a material blessing to all concerned, and maybe it will. We are not questioning the sincerity of anyone who is sponsoring the movement. While it could be possible that too few are doing the thinking for the many, sometimes we are tempted to believe that too few people are consulted in regard to many great projects that are put over by those in authority that do not bring the relief and prosperity that are planned.

EXHIBIT B

[From the Texas Weekly, Feb. 3, 1934]

One of the pressing reasons why a balanced economic system must be sought is that the Government is intending forcibly to restrict production of such agricultural products as cotton upon which Texas and the South are largely dependent for their welfare. The Hallettsville Tribune reproduced excerpts from an article by Mr. Miller, and the Stephenville Empire-Tribune offers these thoughtful observations on the Bankhead bill:

"There is a bill pending in Congress which provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion to each farmer the number of bales of cotton for which license to gin will be issued" * * *. Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD of Alabama introduced the bill, and it goes by his name. Reports from Washington indicate that the proposed measure has powerful support.

"The probable result of such legislation is expressed by the Dallas News * * *. The News, it seems, makes it clear that such a measure would be the final blow to the farmer's initiative, that with such a provision in force the farmer would be owned and in bondage. Efforts at enterprise on his part would be useless.

"Another strong argument against the bill", the Empire-Tribune continues, "is one set forth by Dale Miller in the Texas Weekly. It is Miller's opinion that allotting a certain number of bales to each farm would promote expensive production, because the average farmer would make sure of producing his allotment by planting a maximum of acreage necessary to the production of that amount of cotton. The result would be that a large percentage of the cotton farmers would produce more than the allotment, thus creating waste and running up the cost of producing that covered by the ginning license.

"There could be such a thing as a cotton shortage, too. If consumption would be increased to normal, it is obvious that there would be an undersupply instead of a surplus."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, of course, I shall not attempt to argue here any question concerning the constitutionality of the pending bill. As I said on Saturday, I repeat today that I do not think that strictly it would come within the constitutional right; but we have done in the existing emergency so many things, and are now prosecuting so many activities which are no more radical than this, that I think, being equal in their departure from the constitutional sanction, the cotton measure has more excuse for consideration than perhaps any other emergency legislation which has been proposed.

Mr. President, my reason for saying that is this: The Senator has questioned here, by authority of some articles he has read, the benefits that would accrue to the individual planter. He read from an article which appeared, I believe, in the Dallas News, to the effect that people suffered from the plow-up. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I was the author of that movement. I advocated it on the ground that the Government had a year's supply of American cotton already in hand. It had obtained a part of it through the unfortunate Farm Board. Another part it had taken as collateral against seed loans. Still another part it had taken under what was known as the "10-cent proposition", guaranteeing to the one who would accept a 10-cent basis middling price that if he would enter into a contract to reduce his acreage in 1934 the Government would take what cotton he had made in 1933 and advance him 10 cents a pound on it.

Let us see what the condition was. I know how the Senator from Idaho feels about the question of constitutionality, but I want him to see wherein there was great benefit rather than hardship to the individual planter.

The Government said: "After you reduce your acreage 25 percent, you will get the actual 10-year average, or 5-year average, of what you produced on that 25-percent acreage."

Mr. BORAH. That is, get it out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. SMITH. No. Let me explain. I will repeat what I said Saturday. The Government said, "If you will reduce your acreage 25 percent, get your books and show what your average production was on that 25 percent of your land, and the Government will furnish you bale for bale and pound for pound in what the Government holds at 6 cents a pound; that is, the Government will charge you 6 cents a pound, and if by virtue of the acreage reduction the price of cotton shall rise, the Government will give you the difference between the 6 cents and whatever the rise is."

What are the facts? The farmer made an average crop on the 75-percent acreage. Although he did not plant on 25 percent of his land, his increase on the remainder of his land gave him for the unplanted 25 percent the equivalent of his 5-year average. Every cotton producer knows that it costs from 12 to 14 cents on the average to raise a pound of cotton in the South. What occurred? Cotton went up to 10 cents a pound. The Government deducted its 6 cents, and sent the farmer a check for $20. The Government did not lose a penny, and the farmer got $20 a bale on what he did not produce. So that neither the Government nor the farmer lost a thing, and both of them came out in the clear. I defy any man to dispute that statement.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, the Senator said the Government did not lose a penny. What did the Government pay for the cotton?

Mr. SMITH. The Government had paid for the cotton and settled for it with the Farm Board. Some of it did not cost more than 5¼ cents. Some of it cost more. I am not advised as to what was the average cost.

Mr. CAREY. Of course the Government lost the difference in the average price.

Mr. SMITH. I am not speaking of what the Government had done before I made by proposition. I made the proposition that the Government should go on the market and buy it at the market price, which was then 5¼ cents and 6 cents.

I have stated the facts with reference to the cotton farmer who reduced his acreage under the plan which was criticized in the article which the Senator read, which stated that there was a loss to the farmer and a loss to the country, when, as a matter of fact, every pound destroyed was duplicated by the Government out of the cotton it held. The Government is now disposing of that cotton. It has sent the farmer a check for $20 a bale for the allocation of cotton the Government had, which it sold to him at 6 cents. In addition to that, every farmer who reduced his acreage had the privilege of planting anything on that abandoned acreage for home consumption that he saw fit. So that with what he made on the 75 percent of his land, plus what the Government furnished him in lieu of a full crop, the effect being to reduce the crop by 4,000,000 bales, the price rose from 5 cents to 10 cents, and now 12 cents, and the Government has gotten back every nickel and the farmer has gotten from $25 to $30 a bale. No law was ever enacted on a more constructive or economically sound principle than that.

Mr. BORAH. If such power can be exercised, what is the necessity for this bill?

Mr. SMITH. I will now show the Senator. We had on August 1, 1932, twelve and one half to thirteen million bales of cotton as a carry-over. That means that by virtue of the slump in the export of cotton and the terrific drop in domestic consumption, the world's consumption, both export and domestic, decreased from 15,000,000 bales plus to about 12,000,000 bales. That went on for 3 or 4 years until, on August 1, 1932, we had a carry-over or surplus of 12,000,000 bales of cotton, enough cotton to have supplied the then demands of the world if we had not planted a single cotton seed in the South. If we were to make a full crop again, and pile it up, it would weigh as an incubus upon the industry to depress the price. The problem was, therefore, how could we possibly get rid of this tremendous surplus?

At this point the Government intervened in and said, "If you will reduce your acreage 25 percent, we will give you 4 cents a pound for your cotton over a 5-year average on that acreage."

Every man in this Chamber and in the other House who is familiar with cotton production knows that there is no other plant so sensitive to the seasons as is cotton. Last year was preeminently a cotton year, and in spite of the fact that we took from ten to fifteen million acres out of production, we made about an average crop on what was left of about 13,000,000 bales. Had the whole acreage been left in production, the estimated yield would have been about 17,000,000 bales, adding to the surplus at least 2,000,000 bales if the world consumed 15,000,000 bales, so that on August 1, 1934, we would have had a carry-over of 14,000,000 bales of cotton; but in spite of its being an extraordinary cotton year, we reduced the carry-over by 4,000,000 bales.

Every planter in the South recognized that the exigencies of the weather could not be controlled by him and that he could reduce his acreage and still be disappointed by having a production in excess of what he had hoped for. In addition to that, there were 10 percent of the cotton growers who, as in the case in every other business, would not enter into the acreage-reduction plan. They would go to the meetings, and whoop as loudly as anybody; but when the pinch came, they thought their neighbor would reduce and they would increase, which they did. Not only that, but many who did decrease their acreage increased their fertilizer, trying to make more cotton on land on which they had said they wanted to reduce production.

When Mr. Wallace called me down to the Department and asked me what I thought about the compulsory plan, saying that he was opposed to it, I told him that I, too, was opposed to it. I said, "Never will I join in it unless and except you put it up to the cotton growers of the South. You have every facility to do so; you have the emergency credit system under the Smith Loan Act, and your agents touch every single cotton grower in the South. Prepare a questionnaire, explain what the plan is, and secure the reaction of the cotton farmer."

Mr. BORAH. I will ask the Senator if he has one of those questionnaires?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator can get a copy from the Secretary of Agriculture, and I should be delighted to furnish it to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. One was sent to me, but I do not know whether or not it is correct.

Mr. SMITH. They replied to the questionnaire, but, in view of the fact that about 10 or 15 percent would not enter into the plan, and others would use more fertilizer, and there also might be an extraordinarily good crop year, it became necessary to secure the enactment of legislation in order to make all conform to an actual commercial standard, namely, a 10,000,000-bale crop, and in order that we would not have more than 3,000,000 bales which is necessary at the end of old season to carry into a new one. Every millman and every clothmaker will testify that it is absolutely essential for the welfare of the trade to have at least three and a half or four million bales of old cotton carried over. The great majority said, "We are willing, we are anxious for you to put us all in the same category and restrict us to a production of 10,000,000 bales, so that the slacker, the man who will not come in and help us get rid of this tremendous and disastrous surplus may be forced to come in. Let us get him in." I say let us coerce him in.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I say.

Mr. SMITH. I know it is.

Mr. BORAH. The proponents of this bill are invoking the taxing power of the United States in order to punish an individual.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what they are doing.

Mr. SMITH. That is precisely what I am saying, that if 85 percent of the producers believe certain action is essential to their salvation and they can find a temporary remedy, they should have it applied. I should not like to have a major operation for appendicitis every year, but, God knows, if I were suffering from appendicitis I would go and have my appendix taken out, hoping to get well and then go on and attend to my business. The farmers have got this horrible appendix, and we are asking the Federal Government to help us cut it out; let the surgeon sew us up, and then take its hands off and let us alone.

Mr. BORAH. Because the Senator must have his appendix out, he would not compel his neighbor to have his out also, would he?

Mr. SMITH. If he were suffering from appendicitis I would, if it were contagious, as the cotton situation seems to be.

Mr. BORAH. We have an admission now as to exactly what it is sought to cover by this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. And that is that a small percentage of the cotton growers will not go along with what the Senator says is the program, and, therefore, the proponents of this bill are going to invoke the taxing power of the United States for the sole purpose of driving them into it.

Mr. SMITH. I admit frankly, without any subterfuge, that that is what I am driving at; just as the Congress passed the Draft Act to force men to enter the Army and fight and did not dare risk voluntary service—and this is war.

Mr. BORAH. I did not vote for the Draft Act. I did not believe in it.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, that is the Senator's opinion; but a majority thought otherwise; and I hope to God a majority of the Congress will think otherwise in respect to the pending measure. The Senator and I cannot have our opinions accepted all the time.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is a pretty serious proposition when it is sought by the taxing power of the United States to take away a man's liberty to pursue his peaceful and legitimate vocation.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from Idaho can get the consent of his mind to the proposition that 10 percent of greedy and avaricious men can keep in bondage 85 or 90 percent, and that they are entitled to pursue their way and have this horrible condition continue in my section, and if the Senator is not willing to strain even the Constitution to relieve the rank and file, then I am mistaken in the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, this Government was organized and is maintained for the purpose of protecting the rights and the liberties of the minority.

Without that, it would not be worthy of the name of a government.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was of the opinion that, being a representative form of government, we were governed by majorities. I know that the welfare of the minority should be protected if such protection does not jeopardize the welfare of the majority; but what kind of a doctrine is it that a minority which threatens the welfare of a whole community may invoke the Constitution and destroy the majority?

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly the kind of doctrine that Lenin set up in Russia; when a few of the tillers of the soil claimed the right to possess some of the things which they had produced, a very small minority, he invoked the powers of the dictatorship for the purpose of driving them into the penitentiary.

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about the powers of a dictatorship.

Mr. BORAH. What is a dictatorship? This would be congressional dictatorship.

Mr. SMITH. I am invoking the power of the majority affected by this condition; and that is the reason I am advocating the bill.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly what Lenin did. He invoked the power of the majority, and he was the majority. He had behind him about 80 or 85 percent of the tillers of the soil of Russia.

Mr. SMITH. Is that what the Senator is trying to do now?

Mr. BORAH. The kulaks, as he called them, did nothing more than to acquire property and seek to hold that property; and the minority in this instance are seeking to do no more than to avail themselves of the channels of interstate trade, which is protected by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes; that is a fine theory when it does not doom to peonage every other man in the Cotton Belt.

Mr. President, I am not going to stand on the floor of the Senate and have the Senator from Idaho or any other Senator challenge my loyalty to individualism and to the sovereign power of the States; but, since we in the Cotton Belt have gotten into the unspeakable condition in which we now are, with banks paralyzed, with trade paralyzed, we ask the Federal Government to invoke the taxing power upon the voluntary request of from 85 to 90 percent of those in distress, who say, "We want to be bound temporarily until the trade may be assured that neither the exigencies of season nor the selfishness of 15 percent of the planters shall abort and make futile our efforts to recover from this incubus."

Mr. President, the proposition, outside the taxing feature, is identical with what was done last year. The Government proposes to reimburse the cotton growers for the acreage removed from production. It is desired now to reduce the cotton acreage 15 percent more, making the entire reduction 40 percent, not for the purpose of reducing cotton production in America to American consumption, but to get rid of the load of the surplus which has been accumulated during the dark days of this horrible depression. The Government has come in and offered to give a rental for the acres taken out of cotton cultivation and, with permission to the owner of the land or the tenant of the land, he may plant anything for home consumption he may see fit.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, what does the Senator mean by "home consumption" in that respect? Is that a specific provision of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. It means that he may plant anything with which to feed his stock or any grain for his home consumption, or he may produce milk or butter for consumption on his own place.

Mr. VANDENBERG. He is confined to the production of a commodity which he will consume this year?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; to be grown on the acreage which the Government rents but not on the remainder of his land—only on that which he has leased to the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, the cotton growers cannot use, we will say, this 25 percent of retired acreage substantially to increase dairy products or other crops in the South?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct; the cotton growers cannot substantially increase their wheat crop or their corn crop. It would not be fair to say to the South, "Go on and plant wheat for the market, plant corn for the market." The Government has leased the land so that all interests may be dealt with fairly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is there anything in this bill that warrants the statement the Senator is now making?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly it is in the bill; and it is one provision against which some of the farmers are protesting. I will ask the Senator to look at page 9 of the bill.

Mr. President, it is all very well to talk about appropriating billions of dollars for the railroads, for insurance companies and banks; it is all right to provide $3,300,000,000 for the N.R.A. and many hundred millions for the C.W.A.; but when we want to try to help the fellow who feeds us and clothes us and shoes us, that is a gray horse with a gingham tail. [Laughter.]

There are 6,000,000 actual farmers, each with an average family of 4, a total of 24,000,000 American citizens struggling every day even to hold onto their ownership of the land, with taxes and mortgages dispossessing them and putting them into the breadline; and when we ask here on this floor for $100,000,000 to help them stay in their homes and maintain their self-respect and love for the flag, the caviling crowd here and elsewhere cut it down to $40,000,000. They have paid back 90 percent plus out of the miserable amount they got, and that in spite of the Gethsemane through which they have passed.

Go into the average farmer's home in America. See the condition of his bedroom, the condition of his sittingroom, the condition of his home in general. Yet the average production of these voiceless and helpless ones spells the luxury we find in our restaurants here in the Capitol, spells the upkeep of every metropolitan center in America. We are fed by the products that the farmer himself produces in poverty. We wear the clothing made out of the raw material he produces. Our feet are shod with the results of his labor. Yet the minute we talk on the floor of the Senate about helping him, the Constitution is invoked; and if that is not done, then the amount asked is reduced to the point where it is ridiculous and impracticable.

Two billion dollars are appropriated to build new homes for people, and only $40,000,000 appropriated to keep people in the homes which they have owned and are about to lose, to enable them to retain their self-respect, to enable them to feed and clothe us. Then Senators read some journals inspired by the ginners who get the same ginning fee whether cotton is 5 cents or 50 cents a pound.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and I sat in a conference in which the head of the National Ginners pleaded for more bales. That is what they want. The press men said, "Give us more bales." Of course, the wolf wants as many lambs to eat as he can get. [Laughter.] That is his business. Every cotton speculator gets the same percentage under the fifth or the sixth contract whether cotton is 5 cents or 50 cents a pound. They are organized, and the arguments published in their organs appear very persuasive. One of the basic arguments used by them is, "We have millions invested in cottonseed-oil mills and in gins." I said there was an Ethiopian in the woodpile. As soon as I read it I discovered the bug under the chip. The ginners want more cotton because they will get more money. They want more seed because then the seed men can press out more oil.

We do not find the old farmer getting publicity in the press, but only those who farm the farmer. The farmer has not the time; and if he had the time, I would wager any reasonable amount he could not get an article published in the press. The minute he protests against his poverty and his rags and conditions which cause his children to be ignorant, he is called a Bolshevik. I say now that Bolsheviks are being made by the hundreds and thousands as a result of the stupid manner in which we are treating the yeomen of this country, who have always saved America when her independence was threatened.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I hesitate to disturb the Senator in his oratorical flight, but I really should like to have a point cleared up a little. The Senator correctly describes the condition of agriculture in the South which obtained a year ago, but is it not a fact, in view of the amount of money that has gone to the South during the last 5 or 6 months, that the standard of living has greatly improved? As I recall the figures about $120,000,000 has gone to the cotton farmers of the South during the last 5 months on account of distributing the processing tax, and about $116,000,000 has been paid to them through the collection of this tax. The condition the Senator is describing so pitifully does not obtain today by virtue of an act of Congress passed here last April, as the result of which many millions of dollars have gone into the South for the benefit of southern farmers.

Mr. SMITH. Let me answer the Senator. He must have thought we were very near prosperity if two or three hundred million dollars could bring the people back, who in 1929 got $1,500,000,000 for their cotton crop, and even then could barely make ends meet.

Mr. McNARY. I am not quarreling about the price. I am asking if there has not been a substantial improvement.

Mr. SMITH. There has been much less debt incurred, but the cotton farmer has nothing with which to buy new equipment. He has nothing with which to improve the condition of his home. He just went a little less in debt.

Mr. McNARY. Is it not true that when the Agricultural Adjustment Act became effective last spring cotton was selling at 5½ cents a pound and is now worth 9½ or 10 cents a pound?

Mr. SMITH. That is true, but it costs him 15 cents to make the cotton.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to know if the enactment of this bill will assure any greater sum being brought to the cotton producer than would be brought to him under the Agricultural Adjustment Act if it were left alone to work in its own field.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, unquestionably.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to have the Senator from South Carolina answer a further question. It is thought by the Department, under the machinery they now have and which they are invoking under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, that this year there will be a reduction of some 25,000,000 acres by the voluntary action of the farmers of the country reducing their acreage. It is thought that the processing tax may be estimated at from $135,000,000 to $140,000,000, which is $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in excess of the sum paid the farmers this year. What provision of the pending bill can the Senator cite which, if the bill shall be passed, will insure a larger income to the cotton farmer than if the Agricultural Adjustment Act shall be left to operate exclusively in its own field?

Mr. SMITH. For the same reason that everybody looked last year for a crop not to exceed 10,000,000 bales, when as a matter of fact 13,000,000 bales were produced. I could read from official figures issued by the Department of Commerce through the Bureau of the Census to prove that we made 3,000,000 more bales last year on 4,000,000 less acres than we did the previous year.

What we desire is this: The trade is already saved. If we cut down acreage 40 percent and plant 60 percent, with increased fertilizer and an excellent season, with 15 percent not affected at all, we will make just as much cotton as we made last year, and the price will go back to 8 cents a pound.

The exigencies of the weather are beyond our control, as is the amount of fertilizer which may be used to increase the crop indefinitely, because on 1 acre in my State, by high cultivation and artificial irrigation, 4 bales of cotton were grown. That is an extreme example, but it shows the possibilities. What we wanted to do was to assure the trade that we would get rid of the surplus by August 1, 1935. Therefore, if we can pass this bill and guarantee that only 10,000,000 bales will reach commerce, with the 10,000,000 bales we already have, which will be available August 1, we shall then have as the American supply of cotton for 1934-35, 20,000,000 bales; and if consumption shall proceed at its present pace, we will consume fifteen and a half million bales in 1934-35. That will leave on August 1, 1936, only about 5,000,000 bales, which is only a million and a half bales above what the trade must have in stock. Thus the miserable incubus will have been removed. The passage of this bill will serve notice that the trade can count on only 20,000,000 bales. It will stimulate the price to the point where what cotton we do make will bring us more profit than if we produced a larger quantity. The very statement of the case should be sufficient. We practically failed in our production of cotton last year, and the rise in the price of cotton up to 10 and 11 cents still lacks from 4 to 5 cents a pound of being what it cost to make it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I concede that the Senator from South Carolina probably knows more about the practical culture of cotton than any other Member of either branch of the Congress. With that as a preliminary remark, I desire to state that I read in the hearing before the Senator's committee that Mr. Johnson, introduced by the Secretary of Agriculture, said there was a profit in cotton at the present price.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; and Mr. Johnson is the president of an English syndicate that plants 40,000 acres of cotton for the benefit of European competitors. If the Senator wants to take Mr. Johnson's testimony, let him take it.

Mr. McNARY. I am not taking his testimony altogether. I am considering the very fine estimate placed by the Secretary of Agriculture upon this gentleman, who is head of the cotton division of the Democratic administration.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and we have men in the cotton division from Sweden, where they make magnificent cotton in a foot of snow at 10,000 feet elevation. We have them down there—oh, yes! I guess we have wheat men down there who may have come from the Arctic Circle. I think so. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. If I cannot rely upon the administration of the Senator's party for an estimate of an individual connected with it, where shall I go?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Oregon is in the same fix that he was in under his beautiful Republican administration, because I sent down and got the names of those in charge of the cotton division at that time, and there was not one of them from south of Michigan—not one—and I believe the same bunch is there now.

Mr. President, I want to appeal to my friends on the Republican side of the Chamber. One of the happiest results of my experience here for a quarter of a century is that on their side of the Chamber I have as warm and appreciative and appreciated friends as I have in this Chamber; and I do feel that I have never come here and asked them to inject a false principle into our real life.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I do not want to be insistent, but I should like to press this question again: There is now operating in this field, under the administration of the Senator's party, the so-called "Agricultural Adjustment Act", which brought the farmers of the South last year about $120,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. And which it is anticipated will bring them at least $25,000,000 more this year.

Mr. SMITH. I think it will bring them three or four hundred million dollars more if this bill shall pass.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I desire to know what additional benefits over existing law will be received by the farmers of the South by the supplementation of this bill, and how does the Senator arrive at these figures? The Senator has not discussed that phase of the question at all.

Mr. SMITH. How do I arrive at what figures?

Mr. McNARY. The figures of the higher amount that will be derived if the so-called "Bankhead bill" shall be passed over and above the benefits which will be derived through the existing law.

Mr. SMITH. Because the trades say, "We do not know what quantity of cotton you are going to make; but if you pass the Bankhead bill, we will know to a certainty what we can depend on for our supply."

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator wants to be fair in his presentation.

Mr. SMITH. I cannot be any fairer than I am.

Mr. McNARY. That is not going very far.

Mr. SMITH. Well, it is owing to the receiver, and not the distributor. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. With cotton at 10½ or 11 cents a pound today, and assuming that the Agricultural Adjustment Act will maintain cotton at the present parity price—

Mr. SMITH. The present price is not the parity price.

Mr. McNARY. The present price, then.

Mr. SMITH. Very well; but do not call it "parity."

Mr. McNARY. That may be a little higher. What additional amount of money per pound will the maker of cotton receive under the Bankhead bill than if it should not be passed, and the present statute should be permitted to exist without supplementation?

Mr. SMITH. I have tried to tell the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator may have tried, but he has not done it.

Mr. SMITH. I cannot furnish the Senator brains to take in a simple fact. [Laughter.] If I could, he would not ask the question.

The trades are holding the price where it now is because they have no certainty how much cotton will be added to the surplus. Under the Bankhead bill, they will know to a certainty that there will not be in excess of nineteen to twenty million bales. Therefore, having a certainty that they will not be flooded with the same surplus, the price will naturally go up. I will guarantee the assertion that if the Bankhead bill shall pass, with the proper amendments which the Senator from Alabama will offer so as not to make it obnoxious, cotton will go to what is now the parity price under the N.R.A., 15 cents a pound. That is where it will go.

In addition to that, the farmers themselves hold an equity in nearly 4,000,000 bales of cotton held by the Government. They will get a benefit from that if the price shall go to 15 cents per pound. They will get more for what they make, and they will get 4 cents a pound for the cotton they do not make on the abandoned acreage. That means that with a guaranteed supply of American cotton, the maximum of which will not exceed 20,000,000 bales, and the world consuming fifteen and a half or sixteen million bales, the operation will be complete. I think then we can just let the patient recover and return to his normal condition.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the interest the Senator has in this proposed legislation, as a grower of cotton, one of the largest in the South. I am speaking from a non-grower's standpoint. The Secretary of Agriculture of the Senator's administration, Mr. Wallace, and his two able assistants, Mr. Johnston and Mr. Cobb, say the same price level will be attained by permitting the bill we passed last April to operate as if we passed the Bankhead bill.

Mr. SMITH. Must I beg my colleague, whom I love and respect generally, not to quote Mr. Wallace to me, or Mr. Oscar Johnston, or any of the other gentlemen who, if they knew just twice as much about the subject as they do, would still have only a half-knowledge of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. The able Senator has answered my question. In other words, he would not believe the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone associated with him.

Mr. SMITH. No; I would not believe the Secretary of Agriculture on the cotton question, and he will tell the Senator that he knows nothing about it. He does not hesitate to say so. He is an honest man, and I respect him and think a lot of him; and he frankly admits that he does not know anything about the cotton question. He does not belong to the "brain rust." I started to say "brain trust", but I will say "brain rust." [Laughter.] I do not think he fits into that.

I have found him to be a modest gentleman who is seeking the truth; and I am surprised to find my friend from Oregon rising here and quoting experts from Alaska as to how to grow cotton down in the semitropics. That is about our general method of getting experts. Referring to the tremendous surplus of experts we have, someone defined them by saying that an expert, in the common acceptance of the term, is a damned fool away from home [laughter], and that seems to me about to fit.

Mr. President, I have stated my case. I have given the facts. I have said, and repeat, that I do not endorse the principle of Federal interference in the affairs of a State, especially when such interference seems to be unconstitutional; but I am willing to try this measure, as I believe it will result in the salvation of my people, and 85 percent of them have asked for it.

The Senator from Idaho has quoted the Dallas News here. Find out who are the major operators around Dallas. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Fess] has inserted in the Record an article from a Manning, S.C., paper, and the writer of the article frankly says the passage of this bill would jeopardize the investment in cottonseed mills in that vicinity. We find thousands of defenders of organized capital, but precious few voices raised for the man who is voiceless here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. I appreciate the Senator's sincerity in everything he says. I am wondering whether we are not embarrassed by a measure of this kind when we think of the amount of time and energy and money we have expended in building up the Agricultural Department to the point where it has the largest collection of experts in the world and when we think of the great sums expended annually for the land-grant college work and agricultural experiment stations, having followed the Senator in his advocacy of the agricultural extension work, in all of which the emphasis is placed on production. The population is constantly growing, the demand for food will be constantly greater, and there is a fixed acreage from which food can be produced. Now, after all this money has been expended to make the acre produce more, we have come to the point where we say to the farmer, "We will penalize you if you do produce more." Is not that a striking inconsistency?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to where the fallacy lies. We have spent all the years up to this time teaching the farmer how to grow more, and have never tried to teach him how to market what he grew.

Mr. FESS. I think there is truth in that.

Mr. SMITH. Not a single effort was made to teach him the economics of distribution. Millions and millions of dollars of expenditure are making 2 blades of grass grow where 1 grew before, but no attention has been paid to teaching the farmer how to find a market for the 2 blades. Now attention has been paid to trying to aid the farmer in finding a profit for what he does make, and we have a storm of objection.

Mr. President, I had not intended to take the floor again on this bill after my remarks on Saturday, but I wish every farmer in the United States could sit in these galleries for 1 day and see how many real sincere friends he has. I should like to have him see them. We will strain at a gnat and swallow a camel if something is proposed for the benefit of a railroad, or a bank, or for a home loan, or C.W.A., or P.W.A., or the other alphabetical things, but there is objection if we propose something for the man who toils in the summer's sun and the winter's cold, with covering so scarce and bedding so thin that he and his on these bitter nights must sit up all night to keep a fire going, and then at the crack of day be out to do the chores, improperly clad, with hope almost destroyed in his heart; but out of the aggregate of his pittance he makes it possible for us to enjoy the luxury of a Senate restaurant, to clothe ourselves with that which he starves himself to produce. Yet men sit here and talk about statesmanship and patriotism.

Mr. President, there are two kinds of patriots in the United States. One is the "p-a-y-t-r-i-o-t", and God knows there is a bunch of those. Then there is the "p-a-t-r-i-o-t." The supply of the latter kind is as thin as hempseed, but you will find plenty of patriots when you speak about organized forces.

Mr. President, I am not going to stand here and inveigh against organized forces, because I believe they have built America, and made possible the splendid estate which we all enjoy. But the discoveries of genius were not their work. God touched the brain of man to perform the miracles which are being performed every day, but that inspired brain does not get the money return from what it discovers. We are making labor-saving devices in the United States, and the wonderful facilities for transportation and communication a juggernaut car to crush the life out of the teeming masses of America. We have converted the blessings of God into a veritable human curse. As we devise the machines which release human hands from toil, we put those human hands in the road and under the hard heel of destitution and poverty, and deny men their just equity in the discoveries of science.

We have come to the birth of a new era, and here we are invoking in the Senate men to rise to the occasion and lay aside prejudice, and help us out.

Men cry "Constitution!" "Constitution!" If we do not watch our step, we will pass through an experience that will write a new constitution, and see that it is lived up to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I should like to ask a question concerning the effect of section 5 of the bill. I should also like to have the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The assertion has been made by persons connected with the cotton trade that under the provisions of the bill the entire amount which may be produced in a State in which cotton mills are located could be consumed by the mills without payment of the tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the tax is levied on the ginning of cotton, and the tax is on lint cotton.

Turn to definition (f) on page 22:

The term "lint cotton" means the fiber taken from the seed cotton by ginning.

In other words, whether the seed is separated from the lint at a cotton mill or at a gin the tax is paid.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I take it, then, that it is not true that mills in the State of Alabama, for instance, might have their entire supply, up to the amount of the cotton production in the State, without payment of the tax?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A mill in Alabama cannot use a pound of lint cotton without paying the tax on it.

CANCELATION OF AIR-MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BAILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on the evening of the 20th of March Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker made an address to the board of trade of this city. I have read the address carefully, and it is filled with information on the progress of aviation. He painted the picture of the small beginnings and the rapid progress of aviation. I will not take time to read excerpts from the address, but I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD, together with some editorials and letters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there was so much confusion that I could not hear what the Senator was saying. What is the address to which he refers?

Mr. FESS. An address by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker before the board of trade of this city on the evening of March 20.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his request, and let me look at the address for just a moment?

Mr. FESS. I am glad to hand it to the Senator.

Mr. President, there has come to my hand from the Department of Commerce its latest bulletin, issued on March 15. This bulletin especially refers to casualties in aviation during the last year, and states:

American-operated scheduled air-passenger lines flew 7,159,106 miles for each of the four fatal accidents occurring during the last half of 1933, according to the Commerce Department's semi-annual report on civil-aircraft accidents in scheduled air-transport services covering the period July-December 1933.

The 4 fatal accidents included 2 in which passengers were fatally injured. There were 6 passenger fatalities; and as the passenger-miles flown were 122,157,686, the number of passenger-miles flown per passenger fatality was 20,359,614. (A passenger-mile is the equivalent of 1 passenger flown 1 mile.) For the full year 1933, there were 8 passenger fatalities and 24,850,010 passenger-miles flown for each one.

I do not ask that anything further from the bulletin be inserted. I only wanted to have that fact brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, is there objection to the insertion of the editorials to which I have referred?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not seen the editorials.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator object to the editorials being inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. McKELLAR. To what do the editorials relate?

Mr. FESS. To the air-mail situation, and they are from newspapers all over the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator let me see them for just a moment in order to look them over?

Mr. FESS. I will be very glad to do so. I do not want to take the time, Mr. President, from the Senator from North Carolina; but if these editorials are not permitted to be inserted in the RECORD, I shall read them. But I will not take the time from the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator that he renew his suggestion a little later.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

Mr. FESS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the address of Captain Rickenbacker, and also the editorials, with all personal opinions omitted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection. I have read the address and the editorials. I do not agree with them at all, but I have no objection to their being printed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the address and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPT. E. V. RICKENBACKER'S ADDRESS BEFORE THE WASHINGTON (D.C.) BOARD OF TRADE, MARCH 20, 1934

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, it is my great privilege to be here tonight and try to picture for you the present situation in aviation, as I see it.

I do not propose in this address to discuss the cancellation of the air-mail contracts. The issues in that action are being threshed out in another forum. I myself confidently believe that the air mail will be put back into the hands of the commercial companies, and I believe on terms that will undertake to be fair to the companies and to the Government, and that will also be fair to the country, and stimulative of progress in commercial aviation.

The one reason why this air-mail problem has developed so rapidly into this snarl is that the representatives of the Government and the representatives of the companies are still so disturbed and stirred over the difficulties that cancellation has made for the companies and for the Government that each side is thinking largely in terms of personalities instead of in terms of the fundamental questions at issue.

Why do I have a supreme confidence that the ultimate outcome will be satisfactory to the companies, to the Government, and to aviation? I'll tell you why I hold the confidence I do. It is because in my opinion the final judgment for all parties at interest will be directed from the White House. And I know that the President of these United States is fair-minded and is air-minded. That is, I think, sufficient good reason for my faith that this issue which has swept over the entire Nation and caused such bitterness will be decided by the President in the spirit of the square deal and with equal and exact justice to all.

In any modern industry improvements in equipment and mechanics come so fast that they often overshadow policy. We who are so interested in these things are prone to lose sight of the fact that policy should lead mechanics into progress.

The policy on which the aviation industry has been operating until a recent date was stated in 1926. Briefly, it was that for national defense the United States needs a reserve of aircraft-manufacturing plants capable of meeting war-time requirements. To keep these plants 50 percent busy there should be orders from the Army and Navy air forces, the private pilots of the country, developed and encouraged by the Department of Commerce, and orders for transport equipment from the air lines aided by Government funds paid for flying the mail.

The policy based on that foundation has been successful, and I will soon explain why. Eight years have elapsed, and 8 years is a long time in aviation.

Let us see where this policy has brought us in 8 years.

Five weeks ago the air lines of the United States were carrying an average of 1,500 passengers, the equivalent of 675,000 letters, and about 5,000 pounds of express every 24 hours. Nearly half of that traffic was flown at night.

We had in service—all lines combined—600 airplanes, 1 for every 9 Pullman cars. Every airline company was proud of its record because it was completing more than 85 percent of its schedules. Service was being improved month by month, year after year. From 23 cities and towns served by air transport in 1926 the number had grown to 178 early this year. We served directly the trading areas for about 60 percent of the population. We served directly about 90 percent of the manufacturing facilities of the Nation. Our speed had increased. From 100 miles an hour 2 or 3 years ago it had jumped to 180 miles; yes, 200 miles an hour—more than 3 miles a minute, this year.

All told, our domestic and international airlines had nearly trebled the length of their routes in 5 years—from about 16,000 miles in 1928 to more than 47,000 miles of routes in 1933.

Those lines with air-mail contracts were doing nearly all the flying. In other words, they were providing most of the service.

The contract mail lines were flying an average of about 150,000 miles every 24 hours. The nonmail lines were averaging about 7,000 miles, flying only in daylight.

The mail lines were doing more than 26,000 miles of flying without mail every 24 hours, for which they received only revenues from passengers and express traffic.

The contract mail lines were flying day and night. The rules varied somewhat on different lines, but in general they required that a pilot must first have had at least 1,200 hours as an aviator before he could take charge of a plane. There were about six employees on the ground for every pilot in the air, to see that he made his trip safely and efficiently. The planes were in the hands of trained mechanics 2 hours for every hour spent in flight. That cost money, and it was worth the expense. The lines had established and completely equipped flying bases, repair shops, radio and weather-reporting stations, and testing depots for equipment at 162 airports in the United States.

This is only part of the picture. The aviation industry as a whole employs 20,000 persons directly and 75,000 indirectly. I believe that more than 100,000 wage earners make a living through aviation enterprises and the allied industries.

There are 450,000 aviation stockholders distributed in every section of the country.

There are no less than 100,000,000 users of the air mail. More than 2,000,000 persons use it every day, including the person who mails a letter and one who receives it and the others directly affected by that letter.

Our air-transport industry was one of the first to cooperate with the N.R.A. The air-transport code, which became effective last November, provided for a 15-percent increase in employment and a 20-percent increase in pay-roll expenditures. The contract air-mail lines last year ordered upward of $8,000,000 worth of new equipment. Actual production of more than a hundred new transport planes for the air lines in 1933 increased the total commercial airplane production value 164 percent. The contract-mail lines were spending a very large part of their revenues on new equipment.

Their revenues came from three sources—passenger, express, and mail traffic. Mail payments formed about half of the average airline revenues.

The Budget for the present fiscal year, ending next June 30, provided $14,000,000 for domestic air-mail payments.

For that amount the lines were scheduled to do about 36,500,000 miles of flying with mail. That represented an average payment of about 38 cents a mile.

Now you have heard much talk about overpayments, subsidies, and the like.

I want to say a word about these payments. Congress in its air-mail legislation at intervals declared a national policy which had for its purpose the development of an air transport system second to none on land or sea or in the air over the other countries. The purpose was to develop a fast, reliable, safe, and comfortable service for all three classes of traffic—passenger, express, and mail.

It was taken for granted that the growth of traffic would ultimately make air transport profitable—profitable for the lines and their 450,000 stockholders; profitable for the people of the Nation, speeding up business and travel; profitable for the Government as a self-supporting arm of the national defense; profitable for the Post Office Department, which could make a profit on contract air-mail operations.

That, my friends, was the intent of Congress in passing air-mail legislation. By adopting that policy Congress lent an ear to the hundreds of communities which clamored for air transport service.

What happened to that plan? Why was it not carried out? What happened to create a situation which became apparent more than a year ago?

More than a year ago the contract mail operators were unhappy and dissatisfied. They were losing money. They were not growing as rapidly as they should, as they knew they could grow.

First among the causes, of course, was the depression. But here, unlike other industries, air transportation had more than held its own. It had increased employment and improved its service every year.

The actual source of the trouble was the air-mail rate. In July 1932 air-mail postage was increased from 5 cents an ounce to 8 cents and 13 cents for each additional ounce. That automatically reduced air-mail poundage by 24 percent. Last year the lines carried about seven and a half million pounds, an amount equal only to that of 1929, when the industry was just beginning to creep out of the experimental stage.

Obviously there was only one remedy for that. The air-mail structure should be reorganized. The air-postage rate should be reduced. The public should no longer be penalized, or taxed, for using the air-mail service.

Many Nation-wide surveys among all classes of business and industry showed that we should have lower air-mail postage. There was plenty of evidence to prove that three classes of air mail would be popular, say a 5-cent letter, a 3-cent lettergram, combining letter and envelope in one sheet of paper, and a 2-cent air postcard. Such rates would popularize air transportation. The Government could not lose. It risked nothing. It was at liberty to change the rate of payment to the lines. The Postmaster General might reduce the rates of payment at will. In this prospect the operators had only one concern. They alone knew the exact cost of operations. They knew the difference between safe, efficient, fast transport and cheap transport. I use the word "cheap" in its true sense. They knew that it would be quite possible to put a parachute on a pilot, and let him take off in an open-cockpit plane, in daylight, with a light load of mail, possibly 100 pounds. The pilot might fly his course as long as he could see it; and then come down. If he didn't see a good landing field, he could jump. Such mail service, without passengers, might be provided for about 20 cents a mile. But who would want it?

Throughout the development of the airline network there had been keen competition. Each line, regardless of whether it operated over exclusive territory or not, had tried to improve its service, developing better planes, improved servicing facilities, and more expert personnel, which comes only with years of training, discipline, and experience. The air lines conducted a continuous program of improvement, because it was good business to do so.

From any viewpoint, no line could afford to cease development work and risk having competitors extend operations into its territory with better planes and more reliable service.

During 1933, due to aggressive traffic promotion and improved equipment, the contract mail lines increased their passenger and express business to such an extent that they looked forward to this year as one of great promise, a year in which they would play their part in speeding the Nation back to recovery, a year which would see vastly improved passenger and express service, and with the cooperation of the Post Office Department, a new air-mail program, one calculated to become increasingly profitable to the Government and the public.

That, my friends, was the picture last January.

Tonight the air lines of the United States are operating without mail contracts.

Tonight the aircraft equipment of our air forces is being closely scrutinized. It has been stated here in Washington that the products of our airplane and engine plants are not as good as those of other nations. These other nations do not agree, apparently, with that statement. In 1933, 32 percent of our aircraft-equipment production was sold in other countries. Other great nations were sending representatives here to buy our planes and engines and navigational devices; and in many instances were trying to secure rights to manufacture our products abroad.

This foreign market, which is greater in percentage than the foreign market for American automobile products, has been obtained in the face of the keenest European competition. European governments are using every means within their power to discredit American aircraft products and to take these markets for their own. During the last 3 months Washington has become infested with foreign propagandists, intent upon using disgruntled and unpatriotic Americans, among other means, to discredit and retard American aviation. They have attacked our air transport and our aircraft manufacturers, knowing that the two are interdependent; and that to weaken one weakens the other.

This campaign has gone on long enough. Its end is in sight. We are fortunate in having a President whose experience in national defense has ranged over 16 years. He has demonstrated his constructive forward-looking policy with his Navy program. Unless I misinterpret the press, he is about to do the same with aviation. I, for one, am sure of this, now that he has taken matters into his own hands.

Let us see what may be expected of aviation within the next few years as a result of a new policy which, I believe, is forthcoming.

In the light of what we know to be technically possible, we may be sure of transport planes soon making 250 miles an hour and military planes doing 300 miles an hour. Incidentally, do not be misled by reports that our own air forces have permitted their equipment to lag behind that of other nations in performance. Type for type our air-force planes equal any built abroad. They are just as fast and they will fly as high and perform just as well in a flight or raid. In the quality of our bombers and fighters we are ahead of the rest of the world.

We are weak in numbers. We are not keeping pace with other powers in experimental work of the kind which requires 3 years for final development. The reason is that Congress has not appropriated enough money for air-force equipment, development, and training. I repeat, however, that in quality we are the equal of others.

Let us get back to air transportation. Two years of intensive development work in close cooperation between designer, builder, and air-line operators are required to produce transport planes of outstanding performance. We cannot discontinue that development today and hope to be the equal of other nations in 2 years. We must carry on. I am confident that we shall be permitted to do it.

In that event we can be sure of passenger, mail, and express services spanning this continent in 10 hours from coast to coast. We can count upon a trans-Atlantic service only 15 hours between terminals. We can be sure of a trans-Pacific air service at no less than 2 miles a minute, and eventually faster than that. We now have in our Pan-American Airways System transportation to the most distant capitals in South America within 7 days. In the next few months, with the new equipment, that time will be cut to 5 days. Knowing what that will mean to our people traveling between the two continents or delivering merchandise, I venture to predict that even this time will be further reduced.

Don't for a moment believe that technical progress has even approached a halting point. The number of aircraft inventions acknowledged by the Patent Office here last year was the greatest of any year in history, and 100 percent over the previous year. Time must elapse before those inventions are translated into everyday practical use.

Yet we are not taking anywhere near full advantage of what we have available today. To limit air transport to 168 cities and towns in our big country is utterly unthinkable. Instead of 168 towns we must have thousands of towns served by air transport.

Our present air-mail line network is a fairly comprehensive trunk-line system, quite capable of absorbing the passenger, express, and mail traffic fed into it by scores of branch lines crisscrossing every State. It must be so. It cannot be stopped. Halted temporarily perhaps, but only for the time being. Not one of the executives of these air lines has believed for an instant that the years of pioneering and the expenditure of capital, the devotion to an ideal bent on making this a flying age—not one of these men has permitted himself to believe that this private initiative would be thrown into the discard.

We in the industry have studied the development of surface transportation. We know precisely how the railroad and the motor car revolutionized our life, both as a nation and as individuals. Theirs was a struggle at first. They made mistakes, as have we. Their technical development followed close upon the facilities made available. The steel rail paved the way for fast trains and luxury. The paved highway opened wide the door of a new world for the motorist.

The airplane will do that.

In each form of surface transportation, as it developed, there became apparent a need for a change in public policy to guide it into the clear, straight path of its rightful destiny. So, too, the airplane. We look forward to a magnificent broadening of the various uses for this fast transportation. We realize that the Nation today has the most air-minded President in its history.

President Roosevelt is keenly aware of the vast, the limitless possibilities of this our heritage of the air. He proves that by the fact that he has taken much of his time to devote personal attention to this problem. To his new policy we look forward with confidence.

I thank you.

[Editorial from the Chicago Journal of Commerce, Wednesday, Feb. 21, 1934]

HOW MANY MORE?

Whatever may come out of the air-mail-contract tangle—and there is no reason for much sympathy for former Postmaster General Brown's part in the lettings—it must be apparent to all Members of Congress, including Chairman BLACK, of the Senate investigating committee, that measures placed before Congress should be read, reread, debated, and studied before they are acted upon. The McNary-Watres Act, upon which air-mail-contract lettings were based, has been shown by the committee to have been as full of holes as a Swiss cheese. The theory of seniority equities which brought the 1930 conference of air-line officials into being is the case in point and the reason for the charge of collusion which Postmaster General Farley made but has not yet proved.

If measures establishing subsidies for air lines were not read carefully by Senators and Congressmen previous to 1930, what are we to say of the mass of legislation that is being choked in and out of both Houses in the present speedy session? What is to be said of the "gag" rule which closed effective lips in the House when the debate on the tax-adjustment measure was in progress? It may be true that the measure was drawn up by experts who know more than any of the Members of Congress what provisions belong in such a measure, but it is a poor Congressman—one not worth his salt—that will permit himself to be gagged on such controversial measures.

What shall we say of the action of the House Coinage Committee on the Gold Reserve Act and the speedy action taken on the floor? Is not the quantity of gold allowed in the dollar of importance to the people of the United States? Did not the measure enacted, take from the value of the citizen's dollar 41 cents in gold? Is this unimportant in Congress's handling of other people's money?

The McNary-Watres Act may have been passed without adequate debate and skull-racking study, but if it was, what may be said of the present crop of new laws? Perhaps we shall only perceive the loopholes in the distant future.

INTO THE VALLEY OF DEATH

The time has passed when any of us can bother to discuss coldly and academically the relative merits of Army and private transport mail-carrying.

The question should now be waived as to whether, given a proper period of preparation, the Army might satisfactorily handle the mails.

The issue of air-mail graft or impropriety, now under investigation, has become subordinate to the issue of how much longer the slaughter of Army pilots and the destruction of Army planes is to be permitted to go on.

The tragic death of half a dozen Army pilots in the last few days—which "Ace" Eddie Rickenbacker calls "legalized murder"—and the total loss of about twice that number of Army planes, may well be written down in history as another Balaklava.

As in the famous decimation of the glorious Six Hundred in the Charge of the Light Brigade, so with the Army pilots commanded to fly the mails—"theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do or die."

There is an old saying among aviators that a smart pilot knows when to turn back. But the Army men, as smart as any of them, are given no option. In the Army, an order is an order; and just the other day, a brigadier general was quoted as having said that the Army would "fly the mails through hell and high water and in spite of death."

That's Balaklava stuff. That's nonsense. That's needless sacrifice of human life.

These gallant Army pilots who have laid down their lives in pressing ahead through snow and ice, under the strain of orders and intent upon saving the face of the Army Air Service, are simply handicapped by lack of experience and equipment for their tasks in the mail service, just as commercial transport pilots who have been successfully carrying the mails might easily come to disaster if suddenly called upon for Army service.

Assuming that the Postmaster General's charges of enormous fraud and shameless collusion among privately owned carriers is 100 percent true, assuming that the $46,000,000 which he estimates as the unnecessary burden placed upon the taxpayers, still must we not conclude that the loss of life and destruction of planes which have occurred in the few days following transfer of the mails to the Army custody more than offset the potential monetary economy for which Mr. Farley is striving?

Clearly, some steps should be taken at Washington for preventing the collapse of air-mail service which commercial contractors have built up to efficiency over the last decade.

Readers of the News-Sentinel are well aware that this newspaper has no brief for collusion and graft in the Air Mail Service, any more than in any other service. Corruption should be completely swept from the service. But neither that nor any other good purpose can be achieved by slaughtering Army pilots.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE AIR LINES

In canceling the air-mail contracts of every aviation company in the land because of apparent irregularities on the part of a few, President Roosevelt seems to have acted with undue haste. He did not receive the response of acclaim that usually attends his moves.

Because the various air lines, aided by mail contracts, have been prospering so that the United States today leads the world in commercial aviation, the drastic order of the Chief Executive unjustly might be accused of falling in line with the belief of some of his subordinates, whose utterances and activities leave the impression with the public that every person in the country who makes a profit in business is a crook. Not having been successful in ventures themselves, they simply cannot understand how any honest person honestly can earn a dollar in any line of work. The President's secretary says the order of cancellation came from the Postmaster General, not from the White House, which shifts the responsibility not at all, as no Cabinet officer would make a move his Chief did not authorize.

The statement of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh that the Presidential edict "does not discriminate between innocence and guilt and places no premium on honest business" will go a long way with the American people. And the observation of Will Rogers, "Its like finding a crooked railroad president, then stopping all the trains", will win more earnest thought than all the political clamor of the year could bring.

The United States gave the railroads millions of acres of land in the pioneering stage of rail development; and European nations today are subsidizing steamship lines and airplane systems by direct payments of cash for carrying mail; this as a means of encouraging private shipping and to help aviation along until it can go alone. America easily leads the world in commercial aviation, a superiority directly due to mail contracts, which now are wholly taken away.

Heretofore the President has "backed up" in instances where he has been convinced a wrong has been committed, or in response to the wild complaints of those about him. In present circumstances he could gain wide-spread commendation by revoking his order wherever no proof of graft exists, and wait until the chaff is winnowed from the grain. People generally are for a square deal, and they could not give endorsement to any gesture, from any person which condemns the guiltless without benefit of trial.

[Editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle, Wednesday, Feb. 21, 1934]

WHO IS RIGHT ON AIR MAIL By Chester H. Rowell

Ever since Lindbergh's protest on the cancellation of the air-mail contracts, there has been a systematic campaign, not to prove Lindbergh wrong—events, indeed, have proved him right—but to undermine his popularity. Much has been made of the alleged discourtesy of giving out the dispatch before the President had read it, and of the quibble that it was not the President but the Postmaster General, by his authority, who ordered the cancellation. The manner of answering the communication itself was intended to create the impression that America's foremost aviator was an unimportant youngster who did not know what he was talking about. And insinuations were made, without stopping to investigate, that he had made huge profits on his air options. It turns out that the guesses on his profits were 20 times too high, and that he has since reinvested even this moderate sum in the stock of the companies he serves, so far with no dividends.

The psychology of the whole campaign—and we are in an era of government by psychology—is the assumption that the people support President Roosevelt, not because he is right, but because he is popular, and that in a difference of opinion between him and another man, also popular, they would have no way to know with which to agree. Therefore, Colonel Lindbergh must be made unpopular, to establish the presumption that he is wrong.

The fact is that, in this matter, it is the popular President who is wrong and the popular aviator who is right. The real question is not who is unpopular—they both are—but who is right. Wrong does not become right because Roosevelt does it, and right would not become wrong by making Lindbergh unpopular. The decision must rest not on the man but on the facts. And Roosevelt, by getting his facts from Postmaster General Farley and Senator BLACK before they found them out themselves, is the one who acted without knowledge, as well as without consideration for the consequences. Now, the finest air service in the world, America's pride and protection, is taking those consequences.

This is the first time in America that men were punished first, sentenced afterward, convicted still later, and tried not at all. It is a reversal of all the processes of justice. Even if the result had been just, this would have been the wrong order. And the facts, as now belatedly coming out, show that it was wholly unjustified. The vague talk of fraud has been withdrawn, there being no evidence of it whatever, and the collusion, which is the only present charge, turns out to have been the public compliance of the air transport companies with the announced request of the Government, carrying out the policy of Congress.

These air-mail contracts were frank subsidies, to build up the service. Their cost, under the Coolidge administration, was considerably more, and under the Hoover administration a little more, than the air postage receipts. The consolidation of lines was in accordance with the policy of Congress on the railroads; of the States, on truck and bus lines; and of the Government, on transportation generally. The subsidy accomplished its purpose. It did build up the finest air transport service in the world.

None of that service has yet made profits or paid dividends, though some individuals did make money (and others lost) gambling on the stock market. But it has reached a point where new contracts, reducing the compensation for carrying the mail to the actual postal receipts, might very properly have been arranged. Instead, the entire service has been disrupted, without saving to the Government, and with great injury to both the mail and the passenger service.

If the present plan is carried out, it will mean two parallel lines over every route, one carrying mail and the other passengers, both losing money and both curtailing service. The Army cannot carry passengers; and if it finally gives way to new private companies, these companies will either confine themselves to mail or else compete with existing companies for a passenger traffic which is not yet profitable to one, and would be ruinous divided between two. The punishment will be to the American people.

Such a question cannot be considered in mere terms of the popularity of one man or another. Neither is it a legitimate weapon for the effort of Farley to get Brown. It would not even be fitting punishment for frauds, if later evidence, there is none yet, should show that any were committed. Penalty for such wrongs should be visited on those who did them. But it should be after trial, not before it. Even if Brown was wrong in his interpretation of the law and of the intent of Congress, that should be ascertained first and the action then undone. But not by punishing those who, by Brown's authority, carried out his direction. And least of all by substituting for a service which was working magnificently and about to work better a bifurcated service which will inevitably work worse.

The only hope, of which there are some signs, is that the whole thing was a bluff and that the service will soon be back in the old hands under revised contracts. But even if that right thing should be done this was the wrong way to begin it.

[Editorial from the Army and Navy Register, Saturday, Feb. 24, 1934]

THE AIR-MAIL TRAGEDY

The precipitate action of President Roosevelt in canceling all air-mail contracts and turning operation of this great system over to the Army on short notice is bringing tragic results. Already several officers have been killed, and the end is not in sight. Every loyal citizen will applaud efforts to eliminate graft in the Government. Wholesale fraud is hardly believable. However, where graft actually exists it should be established by legal procedure and the guilty punished to the limit of the law. At the same time, the existing air-mail contracts should have been enforced until such time as the guilty officials and corporations, clearly indicated, could have been properly dealt with.

The Commander in Chief ordered Army flyers to undertake this work. They responded in true military spirit, although their airplanes, equipment, and training are not suited for such work. The unusual weather put the final handicap on the Army Air Corps and the tragedy in human lives is the result. More deliberate, reasoned procedure and less politics, as clearly indicated in efforts of the Senate to establish air-mail graft, would have reduced loss of life to a minimum. It would have resulted in punishment of the guilty rather than the innocent Army officers and their families.

[Editorial from the Business Week, Feb. 24, 1934]

HOW TO SALVAGE THE AIR MAIL

The air-mail contract cancellation affair leaves a bad taste.

It interrupts an efficient, smooth-running service of which every American was proud. It jeopardizes lives and equipment of the Army. If allowed to stand exactly as promulgated, it would cripple air transport.

It has a political flavor; the inference is bound to be drawn that this was in part motivated, consciously or subconsciously, by a desire to discredit acts of the Hoover administration. Up to now the Roosevelt group has not conspicuously indulged in that form of petty politics.

Worst of all, the act has the unmistakable air of having been decided upon impetuously. That is a disquieting thought. If the administration is impulsive and headlong once, it may be again, in an even more critical matter.

Postmaster General Farley suggested to Colonel Lindbergh that, if the colonel knew all the facts, he would not feel that any injustice had been done or would be done. Then Mr. Farley issued a long letter, presumably the administration's complete statement of its grounds for summary action. As such it falls far short of justifying the course chosen.

To us it appears that the Hoover-Brown policy aimed at building up an efficient Air Mail Service and, simultaneously, a good passenger-transport system. Aiming at this, support was thrown to the strong, well-organized groups. The device of granting extensions seems to have been stretched beyond the intent of Congress—all to the same end.

It appears there was much money made in certain air stocks. But there is no evidence of improper considerations having been demanded or volunteered in return for contracts.

It does appear that the big operators carved up the map among themselves. But they did so at the direct invitation of the Government then in power.

That is not the way Roosevelt would have done the thing. It is abhorrent to his whole philosophy. He feels it is just the kind of favoring big fellows that the people voted against in November 1932. We may grant his sincerity. But it was possible to get a new air-mail deal without sweeping and indiscriminate extinction of all air transport companies.

The deed is done. Now the problem is to turn the situation to the best advantage possible. There probably is something to be gained from a new deal all around; let us have it.

We do not believe the sentence of execution passed on the air transport companies will be allowed to stand as written. We doubt if the 5-year prohibition against their rebidding will be rigidly enforced. The personnel that carried the mails until February 19 probably will carry it again, and soon.

But this time on a better basis. The scheme devised by Representative MEAD for payment on a mileage-poundage rate, together with plans to increase the volume of air mail by reducing postage and offering special services, seems well considered. It will get rid of the smell of disguised subsidy; it will be as welcome to the operators as to the Government and the public.

BLAME AIR-MAIL CRASHES ON PLANES, INEXPERIENCE—EXPERTS IN TRANSPORT FIELD PRAISE ARMY FLIERS' COURAGE, BUT HIT LACK OF TRAINING FOR JOB AND EQUIPMENT OF SHIPS

By Con McFaddon, Post-Gazette staff writer

Improper equipment of Uncle Sam's Army planes and lack of proper experience on the part of Army fliers are blamed by persons familiar with the situation for the difficulties the Air Corps is encountering in carrying the air mail.

The six fatalities and numerous crashes that have resulted in the injury of several officers and the loss of eight planes also are laid to these factors.

Bitter criticism has been launched at the Government, but for the Army fliers there is the highest praise for the gallant and courageous manner in which they are going about their difficult task.

It has been estimated the casualty cost of Uncle Sam's first 5 days in the air-mail business has amounted to $300,000, based on the cost of the eight planes, Government insurance, and the cost of training the men killed.

The crack-ups occurred during bad weather, with storms and fog along the mail routes. Neither the fliers nor the planes now carrying the mails are equipped to fly in such conditions, according to persons conversant with air transportation affairs.

Army pilots, they point out, have little or no experience in instrument flying, or blind flying. Under Department of Commerce regulations and rules of the air transportation companies, commercial pilots are required to have 20 hours' experience flying in a hooded cockpit, relying entirely on their instruments in taking off, cruising, and landing.

The service fliers are additionally handicapped because they are not familiar with the routes they are forced to fly with the mail.

Before a commercial pilot is put in charge of a plane, he first must travel over the route as copilot, on some lines, as long as 6 months, to familiarize himself with the country over which he is to fly.

In general, it is pointed out, economy measures have resulted in limiting the number of hours Army fliers spend in the air. The service pilots do comparatively little cross-country flying, this rarely at night, and then mostly under favorable conditions.

It is in the matter of equipment that the Army fliers are at the greatest disadvantage, airmen say. Army planes are built for maneuverability. Stability is a minor consideration, whereas designers and engineers have been bending their efforts for years to develop the stability of the commercial craft.

Army planes carry few instruments, and these generally are obsolete. The equipment of most of the ships now hauling the mail consists of a radio, a compass, and a turn-and-bank indicator.

The radios are out of date, limited in range, and nondependable. Fixed firmly to the instrument panel, they are affected by every vibration of the motor and plane and easily get out of order. The compasses and turn-and-bank indicator are of out-moded types and low in efficiency.

Only once since the Army has been handling the mail has the ground crew at county airport been able to contact a mail pilot while in flight.

Commercial planes are years ahead of the Army ships in the instruments they carry. They include an artificial horizon and a radiobeam. All instruments are in duplicate and are insulated by live rubber against vibration. The radio also is seated in live rubber or suspended on rubber cords.

Few, if any, Army planes are equipped with the radiobeam which shows any deviation from the plotted course.

As one flier put it, "Flying the mail in a commercial plane is child's play compared to the job the soldiers have."

There are other factors that add to the worries of the Army mailman. Owing to the sudden manner in which the job was given to the Air Corps, the service has been unable to establish proper communications. The pilot who cracked up near Uniontown Thursday was missing from 2 o'clock in the morning until nearly noon.

Maps have not been properly developed. Some of the planes pressed into use are not fitted for the job. Lieut. Corley McDarmont, commandant at Rodgers Field, advised against the use of certain types of pursuit planes but some still are bringing the mail to County Airport.

The Army fliers are on the spot, it is pointed out. They are taking chances they would not risk otherwise to maintain the tradition of the corps.

[Editorial from the Ohio State Journal, Saturday, Feb. 24, 1934]

ENOUGH AIR-MAIL DEATHS

Something will be done—and, of course, soon—to return the air mail to private, commercial, competent hands. The error of the sudden cancellation of private contracts has been proved to the satisfaction of the country, and the Government will not be able to hold out much longer against public opinion.

In the meantime, until definite plans are formulated, the carrying of the air mail ought to be halted completely. There can be no justification for a continuation of the slaughter of life, limb, and property of the Army Air Corps, which has shocked the Nation during the past week.

Coincident with the practical failure of the new deal in air mail, former Postmaster General Walter F. Brown has been on the Senate committee witness stand all week, longer than any witness ever was. His testimony is generally construed to have been a boomerang to the unfriendly purposes of the committee.

More important, the aviation industry of the United States—the greatest in the world—stands as living witness to the success of the Hoover and Coolidge air-mail-subsidy program.

[Editorial from the Harrisburg Telegraph, Mar. 1, 1934]

POLITICS IN AIR-MAIL TALK

C. B. Allen contributes to the New York Herald Tribune a startling story on the effort of the Roosevelt administration to take over the aviation industry. He intimates that the whole thing was a political scheme to grab off still more patronage and power. Air lines thrown into the whirlpool of disorder believe they were voided to open up new fields of patronage. It is further pointed out that one of the big four systems, friendly to the Roosevelt regime, has escaped all retribution. It is said to be the company which flew Roosevelt to the Chicago convention and the same company that later maintained a heavy loss servicing the Democratic South and Southwest.

It is felt quite generally that the administration must clear its skirts of suspicion that there was something behind this breaking down of the air-mail system and refusal to give the companies having contracts a hearing. Mr. Allen suggests that in aviation circles doubts resolve themselves into the single query of whether Postmaster General James A. Farley was permitted to scrap the entire air-mail set-up for the public good or simply for the purpose of breaking this particular patronage oyster wide open and dishing out the heart of it, not to the groups that have made America's air transportation a model for the rest of the world, but to those who have played along with the present administration.

Congress has put forward the naive suggestion, says this writer, and embodied it in projected legislation which is hailed as an administration measure that the erstwhile air-mail carriers whose contracts were canceled because of fraud and collusion be absolved by special amendment to the law of 1872, "provided they can show to the satisfaction of the courts or the Post Office Department that their hands were clean."

A growing impression at Washington seems to indicate that the air-mail companies which have invested millions of dollars in preparing for the service of air-mail contracts will again be given consideration after some flat provisions of the law which will cut down the appropriations for this service.

Undoubtedly there has been a revulsion of feeling in Congress since the tragic deaths of several Army aviators in endeavoring to carry on the Air Mail Service as developed by commercial organizations. There is also at Washington a feeling among flying men that inaccurate weather data have been responsible for some serious accidents. Errors are blamed on the local airport pride in politics. Pilots are inclined to lay the blame to either or both of two causes—that in some instances local airport pride leads to a species of optimism concerning flying conditions, the net result of which is a broadcasting tending to keep planes headed for a particular field, although they are certain to encounter extremely hazardous weather before they arrive; in other cases the charge that the Government employees whose duty it is to assemble, analyze, and broadcast flying-weather conditions are in some instances political appointees with little or no experience in such matters, and not much more interest, who have replaced reasonably efficient operators.

The Army fliers can have no such help. The air line—being closed down by imperial order—will not maintain a weather bureau to amuse themselves. They will not get much from the United States Weather Bureau. That is an archaic institution. I think they predict weather from the pains in their corns.

One benefit may result from this disaster. Admittedly, the Army officers should know the country better than they do. It would be a fine idea if every mail plane carried an Army officer—riding there for observation and experience.

[Editorial from the Kansas City Kansan, Mar. 2, 1934]

THE IMPULSIVE AIR-MAIL ACT

Word comes that the administration already is turning attention toward returning the air mail to private commercial carriers within a few weeks or months. It was asserted at the outset of the pending course of events that such would be done in time after new contracts could be negotiated. It was not to be the Army's permanent job to carry the mail.

This recent air-mail policy has been the first move by the administration that has aroused wide-spread criticism. The majority has been pretty noticeably with the administration on virtually everything else that has been attempted. But a sudden reversal of policy of the past few years which had been directed toward building up commercial air lines appeared too drastic. It cost the jobs of hundreds of air line employees. And turning the air mail over to the Army fliers, who were not familiar with routes and were not trained in that sort of work, came at a most inauspicious time. Accidents have taken a heavy toll of life among them.

The result is that a bad taste is being left in nearly everybody's mouth. The air lines which lost their contracts are threatened with having to close down—some of them already have done so. The air line employees are losing their jobs. The Army fliers are losing their lives. The public is wondering if it all is necessary.

Through all the criticism that arises, there is no disposition to discourage the uncovering of graft in the high places, if there has been graft. Those guilty should be punished. Moreover, if the air-mail policies of the past are considered too costly or if it is thought that they should be altered in one way or another, the matter surely should be given a full airing.

The criticism centers mainly upon the manner in which the whole matter has been handled. "Worst of all", remarks Business Week magazine, expressing a rather typical view, "the act has the unmistakable air of having been decided upon impetuously." Affairs of this kind demand more than impulsive action. Those guilty of grafting should be brought to justice. If the Hoover-Brown policy aimed at building up an efficient air mail and passenger service through Government aid is not wanted, then let it be changed in an orderly manner. But sudden canceling of all existing contracts has gone further than necessary.

Alert political observer that he is, President Roosevelt surely will heed the criticism that this move has aroused and will return the air mail to commercial carriers at an early date.

[Article from the Washington Herald, Mar. 4, 1934]

SPEAKER RAINEY'S ERROR

Much as we esteem Speaker RAINEY we are afraid that he shows but little respect for the heroism of the gallant young officers of the Army Air Corps who have recently been sent to an unnecessary death and little knowledge of the cause of their sacrifice when he attempts to justify it by such ill-considered assertions as the following:

"If there was legalized murder connected with the Army's mail operation, as stated on the floor of the House, it can be charged to prior failure to see that the Army Air Corps was properly equipped, the planes properly constructed, and the pilots properly trained."

It is clear that the Speaker of the House has not been told the difference between a plane designed and equipped to transport mail and passengers over a Federal airway, and a military plane designed and equipped for military missions.

To order air transport pilots to execute military missions in planes designed and equipped for transporting mail and passengers would be to condemn them to legalized murder.

To order military pilots to fly the mails in planes neither designed nor equipped for that mission, before the pilots were permitted to familiarize themselves with their routes, has been proved to be legalized murder, as has been so declared on the floor of the House and in many newspapers and around the hearthstones of hundreds of thousands of American homes.

If Speaker RAINEY had taken the trouble to secure accurate and unbiased information before he undertook to instruct the public in regard to aviation, he would have found how far from the truth his assertions are.

As Speaker of the House, Mr. RAINEY ought to know that the naval air force of the United States is first in strength and first in efficiency among the naval air forces of the world.

As Speaker of the House, Mr. RAINEY ought to know that the only reason why the military air force of the United States is third in strength, instead of first today, is because of the well-nigh criminal negligence of the House, which has refused in recent years, and is refusing now, to take the lead in appropriating money to build up this force to equality with the strongest in the world.

As Speaker of the House, Mr. RAINEY ought to know that until a fortnight ago the United States had the best commercial air force in the world.

This force has been dealt a crippling blow by the arbitrary cancellation of all domestic air-mail contracts upon the allegation yet to be proved to the satisfaction of any court of the land that were contaminated by fraud.

Instead of reflecting on the deserved fame of America's defenders who fly the colors, the passengers, and the mails, Speaker RAINEY would represent the State of Illinois better in the House of Representatives by raising his voice and casting his vote in support of the recommendations of the Secretary of War for an adequate congressional appropriation to be used in the immediate building up of the Army Air Corps to equality with the strongest.

That might not be the course of political expediency, Mr. RAINEY, but it would be the course of genuine patriotism.

[Editorial from the Kansas City Star, Mar. 8, 1934]

BACK TO CIVILIAN AIR MAIL

The President's letter on the air-mail situation is recognition of the too hasty action taken in canceling all contracts and disrupting the Air Mail Service. That it has been disrupted any user of air mail can testify. The Army had not the equipment or the specialized training necessary to carry the air mail efficiently. Since the Army fliers took over the service, air-mail patrons have found the ordinary railroad mail far more dependable for prompt delivery of letters.

The proposals in Mr. Roosevelt's letter for the prompt return of the service to civilian companies are generally sound. They lay down a policy that in most respects is for the public interest.

There may be a question whether the limitation of contracts to 3 years is wise; whether it would allow companies sufficient time to establish themselves.

The important defect in the plan is the insistence that no contract should be made with any company "any of whose officers were party to the obtaining of former contracts under circumstances that were clearly contrary to good faith and public policy."

This proposal would mean a wholesale penalizing of competent companies, of their stockholders, and of the public which they are prepared to serve efficiently, without trial, and on the mere investigation of the Senate committee. Guilt is personal. If any official is proved guilty of corruption, he should be proceeded against and punished.

But it is unfair and contrary to the public interest to bar well-equipped companies from carrying the mails merely on the suspicion that some of their officials have been guilty of bad faith and offending against public policy.

Obviously, the public interest requires the prompt restoration of the civilian air service with honest payments for honest service. It also requires that competent companies be not barred from bidding on the assumption, without trial, that some of their officers have been offenders.

[Editorial from the Ohio State Journal, Mar. 9, 1934]

REBUILDING THE AIR MAIL

In its sudden decision to pave the way for a return of the air-mail contracts to private commercial companies, the administration doubtlessly is attempting to rectify, as soon as possible, the error it made when the contracts were summarily canceled, and an unexpected burden was thrown upon the unprepared Army Air Service.

As it turned out, the Government's action disrupted the Air Mail Service even more than was at first believed it would. The death of several Army fliers who took over the job not only revealed a weakness in Army equipment and training but caused, as a precautionary measure, a further curtailment of service than was planned. As a result there are few people today who know which mails are going by air and which are going by train. Complaints of irregular deliveries have been frequent and delays are numerous.

Unless the service gets back on some kind of dependable and adequate schedule soon, commercial aviation will have been given a blow from which it will take a long time to recover, and which can hardly be excused by the undeserved rebuke given Colonel Lindbergh and, by implication, all others who took exception, for his criticism of the transfer.

If the time comes again when it is necessary for the Army to take over the job of flying the mails it is to be hoped that it will be adequately equipped with ships and instruments, and will include in its personnel fliers who have had enough training to venture into the kinds of weather which commercial pilots take as a matter of course.

The intention now to build up the Government's air service doubtlessly includes plans to do away with the weakness revealed by the Army's experiment with delivering the mails. Among the new ships to be built for military use the country will hope there is a plentiful sprinkling of the kind that will be good for cross-country and bad-weather flying and which are equipped with the modern devices necessary to make them ready for any service.

[Editorial from the Washington Post, Mar. 16, 1934]

THE UNCORRECTED BLUNDER

The administration would conserve both dignity and self-respect if it would realize that a mistaken policy cannot be smoothed over either by condemnation or blandishment of those who disagree on matters of principle. With extraordinary ineptness both methods have been tried in the case of Colonel Lindbergh. The natural result has been a stinging retort, requiring reiteration before Secretary Dern could be made to understand that the country's most distinguished aviator means what he says.

Of course, it is never pleasant to admit a major error of policy. But when such errors are made, an acid test of moral and intellectual stature is willingness to assume responsibility and to retract, both in words and deeds. To refuse to do so is to exhibit that stubbornness which is the enemy, not the aid, of leadership. And in the case of an administration which has freely admitted the experimental character of its policy, refusal to turn back from a false trail is the more surprising.

It needs only the disastrous and chaotic results to date to show that the present air-mail policy is leading nowhere. Indeed, each new attempt at justification seems more distasteful than the last. Yesterday Major General Foulois asserted that the costs to date are outweighed by the effectiveness of the training afforded Army fliers. The intimation that this important commercial service should be regarded in the same light as an R.O.T.C. is scarcely encouraging. By the same token the railroads might be turned over to the Army Engineer Corps. Perhaps schedules would be somewhat disorganized, but we would have what General Foulois is quoted as calling "an ideal peace-time test" of military training.

"I believe", says Colonel Lindbergh, "that the use of the Army Air Corps to carry the air mail was unwarranted and contrary to American principle."

That may not be the last word on the subject. But why not is still to be demonstrated.

REGULATION OF THE COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in the course of the discussion of the proposed legislation a great deal has been said about cotton. I do not think the real question here is the question of cotton or the prices of cotton. The bill presents to the Congress and to the people of this country more clearly than any of those which have preceded it the question of human liberty. I propose to discuss the bill rather briefly in the light of that sole proposition.

What does the bill propose? It proposes that the Federal Government shall determine for the individual farmer how many bales of cotton he may gin out of his annual crop. And by way of determining it, every right he ever had to plant, cultivate, and to reap is referred to the Department of Agriculture of the United States and the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and he is told by the authority of law that if he undertakes to gin one bale more than the Secretary of Agriculture says he may produce and sell, he shall suffer a penalty of 50 percent of the market value of it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator from Alabama announced that he had an amendment in which he proposed to make the penalty 75 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. That is thoroughly in accord with the spirit of the bill, and if it is to pass in any form I would just as leave it pass with a 75-percent tax or penalty as a 50-percent tax or penalty.

Mr. CLARK. Or 100.

Mr. BAILEY. Or 100. But I was raising the question now of what the bill proposed, and the farmer who unfortunately, or who by the fortune of a good Providence, produces one bale more than the Secretary of Agriculture says he may produce, either pays the penalty of 50 percent of its value, and therefore takes the loss in the cost of production, or stores it in the seed in order that it may rot through the winter. That is the situation.

Hear me, Mr. President and Senators. If the Federal Government can do that it can do anything, and we do not have a Republic, we have a tyranny. If the Federal Government can do that, there is not a vestige of State rights left in America.

The proposed legislation is the first since I have been here which proposed to take from the people themselves the rights declared by the Declaration of Independence to be inalienable. Although we may be dubious about what the Supreme Court may say in one case or another, thank God, I have not a question of what the Supreme Court will say about the calm proposal of the Federal Government to deny the inherent right of human liberty and lower the dignity of the human soul that goes with that denial.

I could discuss the economic aspects, and I should like to do it, and I may do it before I take my seat; but I do think, Mr. President, and from the depths of my soul I state that I believe we have come to the crucial hour of decision in the Congress and in the country.

It is going to be a free republic or it is going to be a regimented socialistic communism, and if this legislation goes through the latter will be indicated, and at least it will have the imprimatur of the Congress, but not mine.

I know what will happen to it when it gets to the Supreme Court. It will be thrown out. But, mind you, this bill is quite artfully contrived. It is not intended that the victims of the bill, the farmers whose liberties are destroyed, shall have the opportunity to get into the courts until the work of the bill has been done. I protest against that as nothing less than usurpation.

Those are strong words, but the time for strong words in America has come, Mr. President.

The bill provides that no one can bring an action for a refund of the taxes paid under the bill until 6 months after he has made demand therefor. The farmer goes forth now to sow, but he does not reap his cotton until August, and he does not reap it in a big way until September, and he can gin his quota in September and part of October, but when he comes to the first sale in excess of his quota it will be October. He pays his tax under protest. He files his claim of refund, and he is required by this unconstitutional law to wait until April 1935 before he can appeal to the judicial department of the Government to vindicate his rights as a free man. That is in the bill. There is no necessity for it. I impugn no motives. I let it speak for itself. But I do say that good faith with men whose liberties are being taken away from them ought to require that they have a recourse this side of 13 months from today to test the constitutionality of the bill that deprives them of rights which they and their fathers have enjoyed from Magna Carta until this good hour.

I was amazed this morning when I heard the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] invoke the tyranny of Henry VIII and the arbitrary self-will of Queen Elizabeth as an example for the American Republic in the present hour.

Suppose the farmer gets to his district court of the United States in April 1935. He will be fortunate if the case can be tried within 6 months, and that will put him to September 1935. And suppose he loses, and he goes on his procedure of appeal; I think it perfectly safe to say he will be fortunate if he can reach the Supreme Court of the United States within 12 months, and that puts him until October 1936.

Meanwhile the tax has been collected twice. Meanwhile he has been deprived of his liberties twice. Meanwhile Mr. Wallace, our Commisar of Agriculture, will have carried out the sublime conception contained in his recent pamphlet America Must Choose. Meanwhile he will have carried that out and moved from the Southern States a million human beings. I shall be there when he undertakes to move them. But it is in the pamphlet America Must Choose, and if she chooses the nationalistic conception or policy she is promptly told that it may be necessary for the Federal Government to move a million human beings from the land of their fathers.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have been wondering where those people would be taken.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say in courtesy to the Senator that if they must move we might go, like some of our Quaker ancestors did, to Ohio and Indiana; but we would much prefer to stay in our own sunny clime. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. When it comes to moving, will anyone in the territory to which they are to be moved be consulted?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not quite grasp the question. I think we would be welcomed with open arms in Indiana and Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I am sure Ohio would open her arms to welcome anyone who came from North Carolina; but would Ohio be consulted before that is done?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not heard that she would, nor have I heard to what country he would have them moved.

But I bear testimony here in the Senate—and I think testimony ought to be borne here—that the Secretary of Agriculture has issued a command to us, "America must choose." I deny that America has to choose. America never has chosen. America has lived and grown and flourished and there never has been a man in America big enough to tell us that America must choose or that America must move, or whether or not America will choose.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that when Bonar Law was the Premier he thought one solution of the unemployment problem of Great Britain was to move the unemployed to the colonies. With it went three proposals he had in mind. He found after he undertook to carry it out practically that they would have to have sent with them sufficient funds and equipment and also get the permission of the colonies to which they were to be moved, all of which failed and the matter was dropped.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course. But if human liberty fails in America, no man may say when he will be ordered to move, or whither.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Under the terms of the pending bill the Secretary of Agriculture might not move the poor farmers to Ohio. He might simply move them into jail as a result of their violation of his ipsi dixit.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad the Senator read that into the course of my remarks. I might come to that, but I wish to dwell around this point a moment. The Secretary of Agriculture does say, in an essay prepared with all deliberation, printed in the Atlantic Monthly, afterward printed in pamphlet form, printed in the New York Times, very widely circulated, that it may be necessary to move a million men or a million human beings from the South—the land of their fathers. Think of the arrogance of that! Think of the ignorance of that! Think of the contumely of a Cabinet officer assuming that the Federal Government could ever move anybody from anywhere! What a commentary, Mr. President, on modern America's conception of the noblest gift of God to man, to wit, human liberty!

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but merely to call his attention to the fact that when the Secretary of Agriculture was before the Committee on Finance, in response to a question which I think was asked by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] about that very point, the Secretary disavowed any intention of arrogance or any dictatorial quality in his article, and said very simply, and apparently from the heart, that it was simply an excellent and logical discussion of the situation; in other words, that it is his opinion in his own words.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Federal Government can tell the farmer how much cotton he shall produce, either by way of putting a tax penalty on him or otherwise, it can move him. I will stand on that proposition. It can then tell me what sort of hat I shall wear or whether I shall wear any at all. It can then tell me, as the British Government told its subjects in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in what sort of clothes I shall be buried.

It was in that same period that the tillage laws of England were enacted, by which it was undertaken to do precisely what we are now asked to do—limit the tillage of land. But I had thought, with three centuries of human struggle and noble aspirations and with the sacred blood of that revolution which we fought, that at least my land and the people who are my people had parted with that once and forever, and that really the grand distinction between this country and all the others is the distinction that we would not stand for that but that we are the children and the heirs of liberty.

Mr. President, it will be noted that I am not talking about cotton. I am talking about human rights and human liberty. I shall say a word about the Constitution.

I hear it said here so often that it is needless to make discussion as to the constitutionality of a question here. I hear the word "futile" used with respect to it. Probably no more cynical commentary could be made upon our life than that. Probably nothing could so feed the fires of pessimism as that. What is the Constitution for? Should I answer that question in the Senate of the United States?

On the day I walked down the aisle of this Chamber, not a Senator but merely a Senator-elect, why was I required to stand yonder and take one oath before I could be a Senator of the United States? The answer is in the oath that I took. On the threshold of this office and this duty here, this responsibility and this law-making power here, I swore to maintain and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, domestic and foreign. I repeat, I am not afraid of the foreign enemies of the Constitution of the United States, but I do deeply fear the domestic enemies.

Why did I take that oath? Because I was being vested with power and with a trust, and I was taking the bonds of the Constitution about me in order that I might be restrained from usurping power, the opportunity to do which would be given me by my station here. We take no oath to serve the people; we take no oath to obey the President; we take no oath of fealty even to the Government of the United States; but we take the oath by way of solemnly signing the contract, the covenant which is the very heart and life of the Republic; and then tell me that it is a futile thing.

Why, those who ask me to vote for this legislation are asking me to take from the American people powers which I solemnly swore I never would take from them when I swore to support the Constitution.

Not only does this proposal strike at my oath, but it strikes deeper than that. If there were no oath to bind me, if I were just a citizen out on the street, and if I had a million acres in cotton, by the higher law of a great inheritance, by the unspeakable obligation which I owe to those who shall come after me by reason of what I have received from those who went before me, whose faces and forms I no longer may see but whose names and whose goodness I shall never forget, I would stand here, or I would stand there on the street, and I would protest with my latest breath against the acts of a congress or a government that would undertake to limit the liberties of my fellow beings in the slightest degree, for any cause whatsoever.

Mr. President, probably the most contemptible figure in the Scriptures, outside of Judas Iscariot, is the figure of Esau. He sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. He came in from the hunt to his father's tent. He smelled the odor of the cooking meat. Unwilling to go to the pains required to feed himself, he sold all he ever received or hoped to receive from Isaac for the mess of pottage.

This depression has taken much from us, Mr. President. It may take much more of material things from us. I should hate that; but when it begins to take from us and when we become parties to taking from our fellow beings in America the rights which the Government was ordained to maintain, then I revolt. It is too much.

There are concessions I will make to this depression. There are points in which I will yield; but I will not yield human liberty for any price, to anybody, in any cause. When I do may my right hand lose its cunning, and the place that knows me now know me no more forever!

So, Mr. President, I am reminding my fellow Senators that this bill is not a cotton bill. It is a liberty bill—or, in the reverse, in actuality, it is a slavery bill. It is not an economic bill; it is an organic bill. If this bill shall pass the Congress, and the Supreme Court shall uphold it, I shall know that the end of all things has come in America, and I shall prepare for the socialistic regime and the dictator; for if this bill shall go through, we may take from the people any right that they have.

Something has been said here about the farmers being for this bill. I have on my desk some resolutions passed by the agricultural editors of America. They ask that this bill shall not pass until it shall have been submitted to the farmers for a vote. I have some other resolutions of a similar sort. I have a letter from Mr. Clarence Poe, the editor of the Progressive Farmer, a paper with perhaps a million circulation, printed in part in my city and circulated in my State. Even they are asking that there shall be a vote.

Well, Mr. President, it may not be so important to have a vote. I would rather that were done. If we are going to take the liberties of human beings from them in America, I think we might have the decency to ask them for their consent, since we sit here by their leave; but I go a little further.

If every man in America should ask me to vote to destroy the liberties of the American people, I would not do it. It is not a matter of popular vote, and I do not believe there is power in America to destroy the essential liberties of human beings. There cannot be while the Constitution lasts.

Mr. President, I shall finish in a moment. I know the hour is late. I will ask Senators to hear me while I conclude.

I believe America needs an education in the value of human liberty right now more than she needs all the money and all the prosperity that God, in His goodness, might pour out upon us.

Mr. President, I think we have used the word "liberty" without thinking about its meaning. It has become rather ritualistic. I think the Fourth of July long ago lost its significance. I think we see the flag and forget that it is the flag of liberty. We sing the hymn—

My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty—with never a thought of its meaning.

I walk around this Capitol scene, and I see the symbols of liberty, but very infrequently do I hear anyone dwell on the meaning of liberty to human beings and on the value of freedom to men and women.

I would to God that by some means I could find the power to say here, and say somewhere else where America might hear it, what freedom means, what liberty means, to men like ourselves and like our fellowmen.

O Mr. President, it is more than cotton, it is more than balanced budgets, it is more than victories on battlefields. The highest spiritual value in the national life is liberty. The soul of the Republic is liberty. The source of the inspiration which makes the citizen is liberty.

As I have said, I stand here and see the symbols. I have stood before the monument to Daniel Webster on one of the public squares here and read the language inscribed there:

Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable!

And I have wondered just what was in his mind, just whence came the inspiration.

"Liberty and union, one and inseparable." The historian might say that the great Senator and statesman was arguing that we had to preserve the Union in order to preserve liberty. Oh, no! "One and inseparable." We have to preserve liberty in order to preserve the Union. He meant both.

Every now and then I go to the railroad station to take the train for my home in North Carolina, and I see before the station the figure of Columbus on the prow of his ship, coming across the Atlantic in the spirit of liberty, and opening up all this New World to the human race, and I observe that he looks to the dome of the Capitol of the United States, on which stands another symbol of liberty.

Then I look upon the face of the Union Station and I read the legend:

Sweetener of hall and of hut.
Bringer of life out of naught.
Freedom: O fairest of all the daughters of time and of thought.

I pray God, Mr. President, that we may not even give here the appearance of undertaking to take from the farmers of my land their freedom, even though we should say they wish it to be done. I devoutly pray that come what may, though all of material value may be taken, the blessings of liberty may be preserved to us and our children even as brave fathers preserved it for us.

TITLE OF UNITED STATES TO LANDS IN TERRITORIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS—POSTPONEMENT OF A BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on March 20 the Senate passed the bill (S. 1699) to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the Territories or Territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription. All things shall be made plain when we are in Thy presence. Come forth, blessed Master, as a messenger of a good day, and may we open our minds to appropriate Thy teaching. CATTLE AS BASIC AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 7478) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up the conference report upon the bill H.R. 7478, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7478, Rept. No. 1051) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make advances to the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes, and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, under rules and regulations to be promulgated by him and upon such terms as he may prescribe, to eliminate diseased dairy and beef cattle, including cattle suffering from tuberculosis or Bangs' disease, and to make payments to owners with respect thereto."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert: "To amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle and other products as basic agricultural commodities, and for other purposes"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7478) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle as a basic agricultural commodity, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment no. 1: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill authorizing the making of advance rental and benefit payments in the case of the dairy and beef-cattle industries, and inserts a broader provision which makes the sums, when appropriated, available for any of the purposes of section 12 (a) and (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and to support and balance the markets for such industries. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 2: This amendment includes peanuts as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and defines processing thereof for the purposes of that act, and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment includes rye, flax, and barley as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 4: This amendment includes grain sorghums as basic agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 5: The effect of this amendment is to authorize the appropriation of $150,000,000 for the elimination of diseased dairy and beef cattle, the purchase and transfer of dairy cows to farms which do not have dairy stock for the purpose of supplying milk and milk products for noncommercial family use, and for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes. Not to exceed $50,000,000 of the sum authorized may be used for the last-stated purpose. The amendment further specifies that no processing tax should be levied to reimburse the expenditures authorized.

The House recedes with an amendment which reduces the authorization from $150,000,000 to $50,000,000. These amounts, if and when appropriated by Congress, are to be used for the elimination of diseased dairy and beef cattle and for the purchase of dairy and beef products for distribution for relief purposes.

The provision of the Senate amendment making new funds available for the purchase and transfer of dairy cows to farms which do not have dairy stock and for the purpose of supplying milk and milk products for noncommercial family use are eliminated.

The provision of the Senate amendment that no processing tax shall be levied to reimburse expenditures under this section is eliminated, for the proceeds of processing taxes under existing law are not available except for the purposes of section 12 (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and therefore would not be available for the purpose of reimbursing appropriations made under authority of this act.

On amendment no. 6: This amendment amends the provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into marketing agreements. It broadens the class of parties with whom agreements can be made to include producers, and clarifies the provision so that express authorization is given to enter into agreements with parties handling agricultural commodities and products in competition with or affecting interstate or foreign commerce.

On amendment no. 7: This amendment amends the provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act which determines the fair exchange value of basic agricultural commodities by inserting a provision including interest on mortgages, taxes, and freight rates as elements in the determination of current average farm price and fair exchange value. The Senate recedes.

On amendment to the title: The House recedes with a clerical amendment to the title.

MARVIN JONES,
H. P. FULMER,
WALL DOXEY,
CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
J. ROLAND KINZER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think the statement fully explains the essence of the conference report, and unless someone wants to ask some questions I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I look over amendment numbered 5—I understand that is the one I had some conversation with the gentleman about the other day—it seems to me that that is in fairly good shape. I wish the gentleman would tell us briefly about it.

Mr. JONES. That provides for an additional authorization of $50,000,000 to follow out substantially two of the purposes named in the La Follette amendment, one the distribution of beef and dairy products through the Surplus Relief Corporation, and then the use of the funds in carrying out the program for the elimination of tubercular livestock and stock afflicted with other diseases.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman is of opinion that that is about all that could be consistently used during the next year?

Mr. JONES. Yes. Of course there is no limit as to how much could be used for relief purposes, but this will provide for a reasonable program. I want to be perfectly fair. This is merely an authorization. We are going to endeavor to get the money; but whatever money is available, the money in either fund may be used for these purposes, and I am thoroughly in accord with the purposes suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. For the purpose of the RECORD, because certain Members have asked me concerning it, is it not true that the $50,000,000 will be an outside appropriation, not to be reimbursed from the processing tax?

Mr. JONES. That is clear enough. Certainly the $50,000,000 is not subject to the processing tax. This would make it available for that purpose, even though the other fund may be reduced. As a matter of fact, it is not mandatory as to the repayment of any of these funds. No doubt there will be a replenishment of at least a portion, but the funds provided in the original bill may be used for any of the purposes outlined in the amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand the $50,000,000 is an additional amount over and above the $200,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes; in the authorization.

Mr. BOILEAU. So that the total amount of the bill is $250,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is what I understood.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE SITE, SAN ANTONIO, TEX.—REREERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to transfer consideration of the bill (H.R. 8514) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey a part of the post-office site in San Antonio, Tex., to the city of San Antonio, Tex., for street purposes, in exchange for land for the benefit of the Government property, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The chairman of each of these respective committees has agreed to this re-reference and requested that I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to refer the bill H.R. 8514 from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

USE OF EQUIPMENT, ETC., FOR AIR MAIL

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the conference report on the bill H.R. 7966, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department, for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "pension at the rate prescribed in part 1, Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), and amendments thereto: Provided, That in the event of injury of any such officer or enlisted man the degree of disability resulting therefrom shall be determined pursuant to the rating schedule authorized by Veterans' Regulation No. 3 (a): Provided further, That choice shall be made of the benefits provided in sections 4 and 5 of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

FRANK H. FOSS,
CLYDE KELLY,

Managers on the part of the House.

KENNETH MCKELLAR,
CARL HAYDEN,
THOS. D. SCHALL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7966) to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and use equipment, landing fields, men, and material of the War Department, for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon:

On amendment no. 1: Provides that airplanes placed at the disposal of the Postmaster General by the Secretary of War for the transportation of the mail by air shall be fully equipped for safe night and day flying, and that pilots assigned to such airplanes shall be fully and adequately trained in the use of such special equipment.

On amendment no. 2: The amendment added by the Senate to section 4 of the bill did not change the intent of the proposal made by the House but merely clarified the meaning, that the pensions prescribed therein were to be determined pursuant to the rating schedule authorized by veterans' regulation no. 3 (a). The proviso added to section 4 by the conferees eliminates the possibility of interpreting the act to provide for the payment of pension benefits as provided by section 4 and the benefits provided by section 5 to the same person.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment directs the Postmaster General to make a report to the Congress of every payment made by him under this act, including the cost of transporting the mail by the War Department, on the first day of the next session of the Congress.

M. A. ROMJUE,
W. F. BRUNNER,
HARRY L. HAINES,
CLYDE KELLY,
FRANK H. FOSS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that, will he yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain the change in the language that is contained in the conference report, in lieu of the matter inserted?

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman refer to amendment no. 2?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. After the bill had passed the House it went to the Senate, and there seemed to be a conflict in the two sections, 4 and 5, as passed in the Senate. The conferees got together and an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOSS] is familiar with the matter as is every member of the conference. We unanimously agreed that that was the best way to proceed in the matter; afterward the report went back to the Senate, and the conference report was adopted. The Senate has approved the conference report. Sections 4 and 5 were not quite clear as to the possibility of whether or not a man might not claim under both sections at the same time. Of course, the Senate conferees indicated that that was not the intention, but still it was not clear.

Mr. SNELL. Then this really is an amendment to straighten out the meaning of sections 4 and 5?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And it is clear now so that everybody can understand it?

Mr. ROMJUE. That is what we think.

Mr. SNELL. Very well.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ELECTRIFICATION OF STEAM RAILROADS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2950) to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it necessary to ask unanimous consent to call up a District of Columbia bill today?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised it is not.

Mr. SNELL. Have any of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia had notice that this bill was going to be called up today?

Mr. PALMISANO. Today is District day?

Mr. SNELL. But it was understood we would go on with the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand that unanimous consent is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary.

Mr. SNELL. I think we ought to have notice of this kind of legislation when it is coming up.

Mr. BYRNS. But this is District day.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that, but it was understood that we were to go along with the debate on the tariff bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know of any such understanding made on the floor of the House. This is District day, and I take it that any legislation which has been recommended is in order.

Mr. SNELL. The chairman of the committee asked to meet at 11 o'clock today so that we could go along with the debate on the tariff bill. That is the understanding I had. I do not know that there is any objection to this bill, but I think the Members should be notified when you are going to bring up matters of this character.

Mr. PALMISANO. I may say, if the gentleman will allow me to explain the bill, that I do not believe there will be any objection to the bill. This is a Senate bill. The District Committee reported favorably a similar bill in the House. It is to give a permit to the Pennsylvania Railroad in order that they may be able to electrify their line from New York to the District of Columbia. As I understand now, they are unable to obtain a permit in the District of Columbia under the law. This simply gives them that right. It means that a great number of men will be employed.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is the principle that I am objecting to. I am not going to object to this bill, because I think I am for it, probably; but I think we should be notified what the program is going to be each day. If we are going to take up District of Columbia bills when it was the general understanding of the House that we would go along with the debate on the tariff bill, I think we are entitled to know.

Mr. BYRNS. The rules of the House provide for 2 days each month for the consideration of District of Columbia legislation. Whenever District bills are reported, and on the calendar, with a favorable report from the committee, it seems to me the members of that committee ought to know that when District day arrives those bills may be called up.

Mr. SNELL. But we have never obeyed that rule, and the understanding was that we were to meet at 11 o'clock so that we could go on with the debate on the tariff bill. I am not going to object to this bill, but I am making a general objection to calling up matters like this in advance.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That steam-railroad companies now operating within the District of Columbia are hereby authorized, after approval of their detailed plans and issuance of a permit by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia and across the Anacostia and Potomac Rivers with an alternating current overhead catenary or other type of electrification system, with all necessary transmission, signal, and communication conductors and equipment, poles, conduits, underground and overhead construction, substations, and any other structures necessary in such electrification, the provisions of any law or laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. Submarine cables may be used at drawbridge openings, provided previous approval shall have been obtained from the War Department.

Sec. 3. Where necessary for such electrification, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may issue permits to construct conduit systems through or under the surfaces of public streets or other District of Columbia or United States property: Provided, however, That three ducts therein shall be reserved for the use of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Sec. 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or abridging the authority of the War Department, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Sec. 5. The said railroad companies shall be liable for any accident to, or injuries sustained by, any person by reason of any act or omission of the railroad companies or by their agents or servants during the construction, installation, maintenance, or operation of the electrical equipment and apparatus of the railroad trains.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill was submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission before action was taken on it by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not believe there has been a report from the Interstate Commerce Commission, but, as I understand, it is a local matter. The Pennsylvania Railroad has set up the poles and wires to the line of the District of Columbia. They are now unable to proceed unless they obtain a permit from the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. Did the Committee on the District of Columbia hold hearings on the bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. Well, the committee passed on it. The committee reported favorably on the bill. I cannot say whether hearings were held or not.

Mr. MAPES. Did the District Committee hold hearings?

Mr. PALMISANO. The bill passed the Senate, and I understand hearings were held there. There was no hearing in the House committee, except that we took the matter up in the regular way, and there seemed to be no objection.

Mr. MAPES. I have not read the bill, but I notice in the reading of it by the Clerk there is a provision requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to take some action in connection with this electrification. It seems to me it is a matter of such importance that it ought to be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission before the House acts upon it.

Mr. PALMISANO. As I understand, there has not been any objection anywhere.

Mr. MAPES. It provides for underground cables; it provides for other things, and it is a matter of importance, I think, the gentleman will concede. For all I know it is all right, but it ought to be passed upon by some responsible agency of the Government, and it seems to me it should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission before we act upon it blindly here.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Press reports state that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned $60,000,000 to the Pennsylvania Railroad—and I am confirmed in that recollection by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN]—for the purpose of doing this work. I take it that it is thoroughly agreeable with the Interstate Commerce Commission, since the Government has allocated that amount of money for the purpose of doing this work.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS. The bill has already passed the Senate, and has been recommended by the House committee.

Mr. MAPES. It may be that the assumption of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is correct. It may have been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not know. My point is that before acting upon an important measure of this kind, the House should have before it something more than an assumption that it has been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We should have a definite report from the Interstate Commerce Commission before acting upon it.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman, of course, knows that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would not have taken the step of loaning that immense amount of money without entire approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, that being so, and the Senate having passed this bill, and the House committee having favorably recommended it, it seems to me, since it involves simply the question of a permit to enable this railroad to proceed with the work of electrifying its lines between Washington and New York City, that this bill should be passed. The gentleman from Maryland has stated that without this permit the railroad will be unable to proceed and to put these men to work.

Mr. MAPES. My position, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: I assume this is a perfectly good bill, but from hearing it read it occurs to me that there are several important affirmative provisions in it, and it should not be passed by the House without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This approval can be obtained without any difficulty. For myself, I would not want to take the responsibility of acting upon it without the affirmative approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Has not the Interstate Commerce Commission already approved the electrification and the work being done by the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is bound to have approved it, for the railroad has borrowed the money for this purpose from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. MAPES. I do not know whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has approved this bill. Reference is made in the bill to underground cables and other important matters. It is not a very difficult thing to secure the approval of the Commission if the project meets with its approval; and it is my belief that we should have knowledge of the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission before we act upon the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I might say to the gentleman from Michigan that the Interstate Commerce Commission did approve the loan which is being made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to carry out the work.

Mr. BYRNS. I think that is sufficient answer to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. PALMISANO. This bill only permits the District Commissioners to grant a license to do the very thing that is stated in the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman again read the reference in the bill to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is section 4 of the bill. It reads as follows:

Sec. 4. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as limiting or abridging the authority of the War Department, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is nothing in this bill that would limit their rights.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill merely permits them to exercise in the District of Columbia those rights that they exercise everywhere else between here and New York in the electrification of this railroad. It gives them no additional franchise of any kind. I think the bill is all right.

Mr. MAPES. It provides for the laying of certain underground cables.

Mr. BLANTON. That is absolutely necessary. The Commissioners still have control of all these matters, for the bill itself retains jurisdiction and control in the Commissioners and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very easy matter to have this bill passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I dislike to object, but—

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is too late to object. This is District day, and it is in order to call the bill up for consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill is called up as a matter of right.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully as the bill was called up and watched the proceedings with that point in mind. After the colloquy with the gentleman from New York, the Republican leader, nothing was said except that the Clerk would report the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But this is District of Columbia day, and the District of Columbia Committee has a right to be recognized to call a District of Columbia bill up as a matter of right.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Why should the Interstate Commerce Commission pass upon a matter that deals solely with the District of Columbia? This bill simply extends power to the District Commissioners to take care of a local situation. It is not a matter for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Because it pertains to a railroad and should have the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman believe that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would approve a loan of $60,000,000 to this railroad unless the Interstate Commerce Commission had passed upon it?

Mr. MAPES. I do not think we are acting with a due sense of responsibility if we pass this bill without the approval of the Commission.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman, merely upon that sort of an objection, wish to delay this opportunity for employment another 2 weeks—merely because the gentleman thinks this ought to be again submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MAPES. When the gentleman says "again submitted", is he speaking accurately? I have been trying to find out if it has been submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission at all.

Mr. BYRNS. It was not submitted by the House committee, but I assume it was by the Senate committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I asked the Chair whether unanimous consent was necessary to call up this bill and the Chair ruled that it was not necessary.

The SPEAKER. That was the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to be technical in this. If the gentleman from Maryland wishes to move that the House consider this legislation, of course, I cannot object to that, but I do object to taking it up by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar.

Mr. MAPES. But no effort has been made to call it up except by unanimous consent, and unanimous consent has not yet been given.

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day, and the Acting Chairman of the District Committee, by direction of that committee, may call this bill up as a matter of right. The Chair will say that a similar House bill was favorably reported by the District Committee and placed on the House Calendar before the Senate bill came over. Under rule XXIV, clause 2, the Committee on the District of Columbia could dispose of this bill under the provisions of clause 1 of the same rule or the committee could dispose of it under clause 8 of that rule.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consider the bill (S. 2950) to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the motion or the statement of the Speaker. May I ask what the status of the bill is at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House for consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is before the House under the rules of the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again read the Senate bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

BUILDING-AND-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (S. 2089) to amend the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3), relating to building-and-loan associations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of the District of Columbia (31 Stat. 1300; D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3) is amended by adding at the end of title 5, chapter 3, thereof, the following new sections:

"Sec. 55. Personal property: The board of directors of any building association incorporated or unincorporated, organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, to do or now doing, in the District of Columbia, a building-association business, in their discretion, may purchase the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation created pursuant to the authority of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, approved June 13, 1933 (and said association is hereby permitted to carry said bonds as an asset at the par value of said bonds) or may subscribe and pay for shares of any Federal corporation created or authorized by law to lend money to building-and-loan associations.

"Sec. 56. Any building association incorporated or unincorporated, organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, to do or now doing, in the District of Columbia, a building-association business, is authorized and empowered to exchange mortgages or deeds of trust or the notes or bonds secured thereby or other obligations and liens secured on real estate or any real estate, which it may have or hold, for the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation created pursuant to the authority of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, approved June 13, 1933, and said association is hereby authorized to carry said bonds as an asset at the par value of said bonds."

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, regardless of the attitude toward this proposed legislation, everybody must recognize it as a very important item of proposed legislation. Some question has been raised as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation. I lay no claim to being a constitutional lawyer, but I think I know as much about the Constitution as some constitutional lawyers. If I were able to do it, there are two or three things I should like to do. I should like to take the strut out of statesmanship, and I should like to bring the Constitution within the comprehension of the average person in America.

Those of us who are lawyers and those of us who claim to be statesmen are a great deal like doctors; we are somewhat opposed to using terms that folks can understand. I sometimes think if we statesmen were to pursue the methods of the chemist, or rather, if the chemist were to pursue the policy of ours, if he were asked to ascertain the composition of some representative samples taken from a mountain, instead of analyzing the samples he would analyze the mountain out of which the samples came and go through a process of high-sounding reasoning and deduction as to what is the probable contents of the samples.

Now, as a matter of fact, there is not anything very difficult of understanding about the constitutionality of this bill. It is a plain question of whether or not Congress has the power to delegate to the President the responsibility contained in the bill, and this is not a new question in America. From the beginning of the Government, Congress has found it necessary to make delegations of power to the Chief Executive similar to, though not as extensive as, those proposed by this bill. The principle is identical. The degree is different, but principle and not degree is the test which determines constitutional power.

During Washington's first administration the Congress gave to the Chief Executive the power to levy a prohibition against the ships of foreign countries if, in the judgment of the Executive, this was necessary in order properly to protect the public interest. There was a long series of legislation of this sort. The constitutionality was tested first in the Supreme Court and determined in the opinion cited in 7 Cranch., known as the "Brig Aurora."

I shall not take time to discuss this decision, because it is referred to in One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports, which is perhaps the leading case. This is the case of Field against Clark. This matter reached the Supreme Court when it was required to construe Federal statutes which, while levying a tax upon sugar, leather, tea, and other articles, provided, in substance, that the President might suspend these tariff rates in the event he could make a favorable trade with foreign nations.

You will observe the discretion that was lodged in the President in this case. The President's discretion was as broad as the field of American commerce. It is true he was given a limited number of articles with which he could trade with foreign countries, but the principle and power are the same as though he had been given the entire list of commodities.

This power of Congress to so empower the President was tested in this case, Field against Clark. The question was raised that section 3 of said act was unconstitutional and void in that it delegated to the President the power to legislate, the power to deal with import duties, which power, by section 1 of article VIII of the Constitution, is vested in the Congress.

In this opinion the Court reviewed the former acts of Congress from Washington's administration down, to which I have referred, approved them and held that in the acts under challenge there was no unconstitutional attempt to delegate powers to the President. I will call your attention to section 3 of the act under examination in that case. This reading is perhaps not very interesting. I appreciate the attention that the Members of Congress are giving to this rather dry statement of a very important matter.

This is section 3 of the act to which I have referred:

With a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles and for this purpose on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any other such article, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States—

And so forth.

In the event the President became convinced of these facts and then became convinced of the opportunity of making a good bargain—this is the plain common-sense translation of the language—the President was authorized to make a trade agreement and in making that trade to modify an existing rate.

The Court here refers to the decision in the case of the brig Aurora (7 Cr.), to which I have referred, and approved that decision. I am proceeding as rapidly as I can because I do not want to take too much of your time.

Among the declarations of the Court in this opinion is this one:

If we find the Congress has frequently, from the organization of the Government to the present time, conferred upon the President powers with reference to trade and commerce like those conferred by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, the fact is entitled to great weight in determining the question before us.

Which was a question of constitutionality.

This pronouncement of the Court is important because of the fact that since the beginning of the Government powers similar to that sought to be conferred by the bill now under consideration were conferred by the Congress upon the Chief Executive. The Supreme Court pronounced the rule of construction in this case, of Field versus Clark, which is the present rule of construction, that long-continued governmental practice is to be given great consideration.

Now, you will recall the language contained in the act, construed in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States, referred to—

That at any time after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient—

And so forth.

You have heard a good deal in the argument with reference to the unconstitutionality of this bill that it does not put up a definite yardstick. There can be no broader yardstick than that contained in the act approved by the Supreme Court, in which it held that a delegation to the discretion of the President by the Congress to act whenever he, the President, should deem it expedient, when he examined the facts and matured a judgment he should put into operation powers conferred upon him by the Congress if he deemed it expedient.

I continue to quote from Field versus Clark:

While some of these precedents are stronger—

The Court is referring now to the legislative precedents to which I have referred—than others in their application to the case before us, they all show that in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government—

Now, pay particular attention to this, if you please—

It is often desirable, if not essential, for the protection of the interests of our people against the unfriendly and discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations * * * as given by so many acts of Congress and embracing almost the entire period of our national existence should not be overruled, unless upon a conviction that such legislation was clearly incompatible with the supreme law of the land.

And, again, the Court holds in this case—and I am referring extensively to this decision, because it clearly is the leading case in the United States, establishing the power of the Congress to make this character of delegation of authority to the President which is embodied in the bill under consideration. The first of these acts to which the Court refers was that of June 1, 1794, and was during Washington's first administration.

He was given power to lift certain restrictions on international commerce and to reestablish them whenever in his opinion—not the opinion of Congress—the public safety required. If not in this act the power to reestablish was given, it certainly was given by a subsequent act, the one construed in Seventh Cranch referred to.

This is interesting in view of the fact that while it is held that Congress cannot delegate to the President legislative power, it is also held that the delegation of this sort of power, the sort proposed by this bill to be delegated, is not a legislative power or authority.

With your permission, I am going to move across a considerable period of time in our governmental history and direct your attention now to a comparatively recent case—the case of Hampton & Co. against the United States, reported in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Taft.

I think this is the only other authority to which I shall refer, although I have a memorandum of others.

This case arose under the flexible-tariff provision of the tariffs acts, with which you are all familiar. The contention was made in that case that Congress had no constitutional authority to make that delegation to the Chief Executive. In other words, it was attacked as an attempt to delegate to the Chief Executive the power to make a law.

The Court passed squarely on that question and held in that case, in that situation Congress had not delegated legislative power to the President. The Court recognized, of course, the great power that had been delegated to the President, but held it was within constitutional warrant.

Chief Justice Taft, in the rendition of this opinion, likened the power exercised by the President under the flexible provision to the power exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is like that power. These powers come from the same source, and their delegation is subject to identically the same constitutional limitations. When you contemplate the powers exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the delegation by the Congress, you may quite appreciate within what scope the powers of Congress can be delegated to the Chief Executive under the provisions of the Constitution dealing with the revenue.

This opinion, if you will take occasion to examine it, if you have the interest to do it, you will find that it and the opinion which I cited in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States cover the whole field. In other words, it is not at all necessary to make an examination of any other authority in order to understand exactly what is the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to this sort of legislation.

Perhaps it would be worth while for me to take a little time to call attention to section 315—I believe that is the act of 1922—

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Section 315 corresponds to section 350.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Section 315 provides:

That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country, he shall, by said investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in such costs of production necessary to equalize the same.

Here is something that possibly a good many have overlooked. I had until I made this examination. In section (c) of this act it is provided that in ascertaining the difference between the cost of production under the previous subdivisions, (a) and (b) of this section, the President, insofar as he finds it practicable, shall take into consideration the difference in conditions in production, including wage, cost of material, and other items, in the cost of production of such articles in the United States and in competing territory. Then follows 2 and 3 and 4, and 4 is a very interesting provision. It is as follows:

Any other advantage or disadvantage in competition.

Therefore, we have a law on the statute books now which authorizes the President of the United States in modifying the rate fixed by the Congress up or down 50 percent to take into consideration what we know as the cost-of-production difference, and then any other advantage or disadvantage in competition. That is as broad as the earth. It is difficult to conceive of any motive or reason or justification that a President would like to have actuate him in changing tariff rates which he wants to change that could not be covered in under that language.

I want now to refer you to the language of Chief Justice Taft, already referred to, in which he declared that the same principal which permits Congress to delegate power to fix railroad rates authorizes Congress to delegate power to fix custom rates.

This is what the Court held:

The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with this provision the fixing of such rates justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

After one reads that declaration by the Supreme Court and calls to mind the wide range of discretion exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States in fixing rates, any lingering doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill disappears. I have not tried to make a constitutional argument of the orthodox sort. I hope I may have been of some assistance even to those who do not agree with my conclusions.

I am going to yield now for a few minutes to any inquiries that Members may desire to put to me. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am going to ask the chairman for just a few minutes more in order that I may yield for a few questions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I should be glad to yield to any questions. This House is a very interesting body to me. I have found that most people who ask questions in this House want some information. Of course, occasionally someone will ask a question to trip one up, but that is all right.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have been trying to follow the argument of the gentleman, and from what I have heard I have the idea that the sum and substance of the holding in the case in the One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports and the subsequent case by Chief Justice Taft is that the Congress does not delegate to the President legislative authority, but mere power to deal with the legislation submitted to him, and leaves entirely to the President the exercise of discretion as to the time, the necessity, and the methods of applying the legislation to the particular questions which he has to consider, and that it is not in fact a delegation of legislative authority, but merely a delegation of power to deal with legislation that has already been enacted.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is what the courts hold with regard to the powers which have heretofore been delegated by the Congress to the President. That is what the courts have held with regard to the extraordinary powers that have been delegated by Congress to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and there are some other decisions, a number of them, dealing with the constitutionality of the delegation of power which Congress has delegated to various other agencies of the Government which exercise discretion. In this particular case, to translate the language of this bill into simple language, it is this: If enacted, it would carry with it a declaration on the part of Congress that the job of rehabilitating this country has not been completed. It seems to me to indicate a judgment on the part of Congress that one of the chief difficulties of ours, or the chief diseases, lies in our economic circulatory system. I like to use that expression because a long time ago I coined the phrase, and I never have been able to get anybody to repeat it. We have about all the things we need in this country and in the world, plenty of everything, but they do not circulate. We have just as definite an economic circulatory system as a doctor can find in the human body. We have an economic circulatory system in the world of which we are a part. No man lives unto himself and no nation can live unto itself.

We are a part of the business of the world. We are a part of the economic body of the world. This bill recognizes that we are in an unusual situation. Possibly the Congress would not be willing to express a judgment as to what ought to be done and project that judgment into the period between this Congress and the next Congress, because things are too much in a state of flux. That is one reason why this bill is proposed.

Now, by this bill what you propose to do is to say to the President of the United States, "We are concerned to see normal economic circulation revived in this country and revived in the world, and we give you authority to do what you can to help in that regard, taking care of the interest of our people. You are authorized to move to the right or the left, up or down, and if you find that movement in either of those directions carry you into greater difficulty, carries you not to the goal, then you can change your direction, and change before too great harm may be done to our hope and to the world's hope of recovery. While we must preserve our unrivaled nationalism and guard our economic independence, insofar as it exists, it would seem an impossible thing for us to reach a happy, secure, economic stability in which the other nations have no part.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] 10 additional minutes.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I have read the decision to which the gentleman has referred and note carefully that the Court holds that this delegation of taxing power is not a delegation of the power. For instance, if the President raises a tariff duty 50 percent, as he is authorized to do under the law, the Court holds that he is not levying a tax on the people. That is what I understand to be the holding of the Court.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not think that is the holding.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I think that is exactly what it holds. I think it is, and I want to know the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not he is levying a tax if he raises the duty to 50 percent, because taxing is the power of Congress and not the power of anybody else.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Possibly the gentleman is right.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I should like to ask the distinguished jurist—

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is not I.

Mr. MOTT. I think it is. I should like to ask the distinguished jurist if he does not think there is a fundamental difference between Congress setting up a commission like the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the purpose of regulating domestic utilities by fixing rates, and Congress delegating to the Executive legislative authority to make tariffs?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; there would be a difference if the gentleman's premise were sound.

Mr. MOTT. I understood the gentleman to draw a parallel between those two actions of Congress, and to say that they were similar.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Perhaps I can state my view on what I believe is part of that which is in the gentleman's mind. When Congress delegates power to the President it does not thereby delegate power to the Chief Executive as such. It delegates power to an individual who is defined and located by the description of the office which he holds.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman please, I did not say the executive department. I said "Executive", and by that I meant the President.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. I may have involved myself in trying to be clear. The delegation of power to the President, insofar as its constitutionality is concerned, is the same as the delegation of power to any other person, not the President.

Mr. MOTT. I can see that distinction; but is not the power delegated an entirely different kind of power? Is not the power delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate domestic utilities by fixing rates entirely different than the power which this bill proposes to delegate to the President, to exercise a function formerly exercised by Congress?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to my friend that the power of Congress to regulate rates in interstate commerce is identically the same sort of power which the Congress holds under the Constitution to regulate import duties. That is what I am trying to say. So a delegation to an agency to deal with one, insofar as constitutional questions are concerned, seems to me to be identical with the delegation of power to deal with the other. I am afraid that is as clear as I can make it. That is my view, and that is the best I can do about it.

Mr. MOTT. That is clear. But does not the gentleman think there is a difference between the power impliedly in Congress to regulate domestic utilities by fixing a rate, and the specific power of making tariffs, which is given to the Congress by the Constitution?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; not insofar as the nature of the power or insofar as the ability to Congress to delegate is concerned. That is the best I can do about it. I may be wrong, of course. I think not.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I wish the gentleman knew how much I appreciated his opinion, and he would then know why I am asking this question. In the Hampton case, Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports, the question before the Court was one in which the Tariff Commission had indeed found, and had indeed told, the President what it regarded as the difference in cost of production. Is that a correct statement of the case?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I assume that is correct; yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Now, if that is true, then insofar as the Court discussed any other proposition in the case, as, for example, the general omnibus provisions of the act whereby the President could change tariffs for any other reason, that discussion would not be appropriate to the real decision if the facts were such as were based on the difference in cost of production.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think the gentleman is largely correct in his conclusion. I do believe, however, in reading this case, that the Chief Justice anticipated questions that might arise, and did intend to pronounce the judgment of the Supreme Court not only with regard to this matter but with regard to the closely associated collateral matters which he might expect to come.

For instance, the declaration of the Court in this case with regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission in a very definite sense is obiter, but that pronouncement was so related to the thing decided and is so obviously sound that it may be given full credit as a definite determination by the court of last resort of the fact of law embodied in the words which I have quoted.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am simply pointing out that those things are not really within the case so far as the decision itself is concerned.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have followed the gentleman's discussion very closely. From what I understood him to say, he considers this law as a continuation of the policy laid down in the flexible clause of the present tariff act.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is an extension of the same power.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If it is an extension of the flexible provision, how can the gentleman square his vote against the flexible provision 2 years ago with his present advocacy of this power?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course the gentleman is not asking me a question that deals with the constitutionality of this bill, the thing at the moment being considered; but I will answer him.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I think the gentleman would not vote for anything that was not constitutional.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I voted against it before. The gentleman would not want to hold me to vote for everything just because it was constitutional.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not think the gentleman would vote for any bill that was not constitutional.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I voted against it before, whatever you may want to make of that.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I want to read the gentleman three short paragraphs and ask him a question at the conclusion. This is from a statement made on the floor of the House February 13, 1932, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]:

There is a tendency in this country manifested when we come to write a tariff bill to surrender the powers which Nature says belong to the representative branch.

They are being surrendered to the Executive. That is the truth of it; and we are accumulating about the President of the United States powers so great that no human being in human history has been able, and no human being ever will be able, to possess without their abusive exercise. I mean God Almighty has put that limitation upon human capacity.

When we come to deal with our powers and responsibilities, gentlemen of the Congress, let us not try to hide ourselves and protect ourselves against the people through the shifting of powers to the Executive—powers which belong to us.

Does the gentleman still feel that way?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think the statements of Mr. SUMNERS on the floor under the circumstances under which they were uttered were very wise statements. [Laughter.] And if anybody believes that I believe in these concentrations of Federal power as a permanent policy of government or as a policy under normal conditions, he is very much mistaken. I not only do not like these concentrations of power in the Federal Government but I do not like the concentration of power in the executive branch of the Government.

As I view this situation and as I have tried to state it several times on the floor of the House, we are not privileged now to deal with the economic conditions of this country safely. We passed that day and that opportunity while you were saying everything will be all right around the corner. Great difficulties were challenging us to meet the situation, but you were going along saying, "Everything will be all right—just around the corner."

I stated on the floor of the House during the last administration and tried to point out to my colleagues that we were headed for the rocks. The only response I got was "No, no." Now, we do not have the privilege of proceeding safely any more than a nation at war has the privilege of proceeding safely. We are engaged in the greatest economic war that ever challenged the genius of the statesmanship and of the people of any age or generation; and now we are paying the penalty and the House is having to do dangerous things in order to save our very economic existence. If during the 12 years that preceded this administration—and I am not speaking only of the Republicans, I am speaking of the American people. I tried in my small way to rouse this Congress to a consciousness of its danger. I went to my own people and told them we were headed for the rocks; and nobody would listen. The man in the White House then, Mr. Hoover, I do not hold entirely responsible; it was the responsibility of the American people. The point I am trying to bring home to you gentlemen on the Republican side is that you fiddled while Rome was catching fire. Now we have got to try to put out the flames. I do not place all the responsibility on that side. I want that understood, for the gentleman has quoted what I said some years ago. What I said then was right, and sound under normal conditions.

A good many people seem to feel that we have about reached the shore and they are beginning to rock the boat. Every Republican voted against this bill in the committee; every Democrat voted for it in the committee. That is a dangerous sign. Over all this country we see people, it seems to me, who just a year ago were crying out for salvation, willing to do anything; now, when the President is trying to bring the ship to shore, the ship which has the whole United States aboard, they have forgotten their danger, having had a little taste of profits and dividends, and are rocking the boat.

If I am quoted on this next statement I hope the statement will be balanced up. Laboring men who have not had a job for 2 years and who now have a little taste of employment are looking around for an excuse to strike. Republicans who have been going along with the administration, standing shoulder to shoulder with the administration, are now playing for political advantage. Over on the Democratic side we are rowing about this thing, that thing, and the other thing. I am not criticizing you. The election is mighty close. If our situations were changed around I guess we would be doing the same thing. I am not putting on airs or assuming any "holier than thou" attitude, but may I say to the Democratic side and to the Republican side, and I hope I will not appear presumptuous, and to the great captains of industry and finance and to the laboring men, and to the people as a whole, that we have not reached the shore. We are in the middle of the stream, and we are living on borrowed money. This thing which a lot of people are mistaking for normal prosperity is the result of a shot in the arm and we have been borrowing the money to buy the dope.

I want to tell you right now, and I say to the American people today, that this Nation is on the brink yet. Of course, we all get irritated at some of these generals and professors telling the American people what to do, but I imagine they are worn to a frazzle. I imagine they are worn out. The point is when you rock the boat the other fellow is in you rock the boat you are in. We are all in the same boat. That is what I am trying to say. [Applause.]

May I tell you right now that this is no time to try to play any funny stuff. If there ever was a time in the history of the Nation when conditions challenged us to forget our personal interests and to put our hands to the oar and devote ourselves to trying to reach shore, it is this minute.

I am uneasy about the rows and controversies developing all over the United States. I do not think Mr. Roosevelt is other than a mortal. He makes mistakes. But there is a man who is giving his life in an effort to save his people. He is entitled to the confidence and support of everyone who has any concern for their own self-interests. He has not had a chance to do this thing properly. I do not like to see all these professors brought in. Professors are mighty good to instruct and advise, but they are mighty poor to direct and determine. They are all right in their job, but this is not their job. But they were about all he could get, because the truth is that most of us statesmen have been looking no further into the mysteries of statecraft, not much further, than the next election.

The President hoped to have a little time to orient himself before he had to tackle the job, but you will remember that the music of the bands that celebrated his inauguration was marred by the crashing of banks all over the Nation the very day of the celebration. When the responsibilities came he did not have a minute. The banks, the railroads, the life-insurance companies, the whole economic structure, was tottering and about to fall.

Up to this time in the main he has been trying to do two things. He has been trying to prevent that structure from falling, and at the same time keeping millions of idle people from starving. But the real work of construction and reconstruction in the main is yet to be done. The Democrats and the Republicans deep down under the skin are the same sort of people. I do not claim for the right-hand side of this Chamber one thing that I do not yield to the men and women on the left-hand side of this Chamber. I have never seen the time since I have been here when we were faced with a real crisis, and the men on the Republican side realized that the crisis was at hand, that they did not rise to as high a level of statesmanship as anybody on the Democratic side. At this time I am trying to speak to my people. You are not Democrats or Republicans in the hour of your Nation's danger. You are the representatives of a people who are looking to you in this hour of great peril. We are operating under a war psychology.

As I have tried to say two or three times, it is a very interesting fact that the Anglo-Saxon people, our people, who have operated a parliamentary system of government for over a thousand years, have developed certain governmental instincts. One of the governmental instincts which Anglo-Saxon people have developed is to scent the existence of a crisis that requires a quicker pick-up and a stronger power than the ordinary Anglo-Saxon institutions afford. Under such circumstances, en masse they turn from the ordinary operation of their governmental machines and concentrate governmental powers in their Executive. We have had the remarkable genius, however, of concentrating those powers and at the same time retaining the power to control their exercise and the power of recapture and redistribute them.

We are in one of those hours now. With all due respect, it is positively ridiculous for a man to stand on the floor of this House, when our country is at war with economic conditions and the whole nation is operating under a war psychology, and undertake to measure human conduct and legislative duty in this hour by the standards which the people observe under ordinary conditions. That is the answer to my friend, the distinguished gentleman who asked me with regard to what I said 2 years ago. I hope conditions will permit me to say that something less than 2 years from now I want these plans to be successful but not satisfactory. I believe in the people, in their ability, and in their right to govern themselves. No people can remain free who lose the capacity for self-government. That capacity can be preserved only by its exercise. If I did not believe that we could turn from this unsatisfactory condition and go back to a condition of local and individual responsibility, I would say let the crash come now. I would rather have liberty and distributed responsibility than a half cent more per pound for my pigs. [Applause.] We have been a foolish generation, a childish generation. We have gone head-on into this awful mess. We have got to stand together or we fall separately.

The first thing to do now is to get shoulder to shoulder and work together. We are all in the same boat. I think you Republicans will pick up a good many votes, anyhow, next time. If we could get some like BERT SNELL and quite a lot of others over there I would not mind it so much. Of course, I would hate to give up any of the boys on this side, but in your desire to get votes do not rock the boat. The swimming will be just as hard for BERT SNELL and his crowd if you turn the boat over as it is going to be for the boys on this side and for our people.

There are some dangerous indications abroad in the land. I do not like this sort of legislation any more than you do. But the big job is to restore trade, to revive commodity circularization.

We have permitted whatever opportunity we had to proceed in the ordinary way to go by.

Quick action, ability quickly to back up if hurtful results begin to be manifest—these are demanded by the difficulties in which we are involved. That is why we have now to give these powers to the President.

I cannot just exactly tell you where I started and I am certainly not sure where I have arrived, but I know my time is out, and I thank you very much for the privilege of talking with you. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 8687 is a bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. Its purpose is the promotion of foreign trade. The surplus products of farm and factory should find a market in all foreign lands. Depression unparalleled in our history invites an earnest effort to restore prosperity to our common country. Unemployment is abroad in the land. A united appeal from the masses for relief should spur Congress to action. In response to this demand this bill is proposed and presented to Congress by the Ways and Means Committee at the instance of President Roosevelt, and its early passage urged upon this body. Confidence in the President is invited.

Trade and commerce are a necessity to the prosperity of nations and those nations in all ages that have encouraged commerce have grown in wealth and power. Note the life and history of Rome, Spain, Great Britain, and Japan. Ancient Rome became great and powerful through the extension of her trade and commerce with all nations and the Roman Empire dominated the known world. When she lost her world trade and commerce, her power and wealth were gone and isolation became her heritage. When Spain lost her foreign trade and her colonies to other countries, this once proud nation of extensive commerce dropped to a third-rate power, and might now be classed as a self-contained nation living within its own borders a life of isolation, her world influence largely gone. The power and wealth and influence of Great Britain is due to her trade and commerce with all the peoples of all climes and her trading vessels plow the waves of all seas, her commerce extends over all lands and the sun never ceases to shine upon her British colonies and possessions. Whenever she loses her trade and commerce, isolation will be her heritage and her power as a great nation of world-wide influence will have ended. Japan, uncivilized, lived in darkness and ignorance of the outside world until a great American steered his United States vessel into the harbor of Japan and there opened its eyes to the fact that there was an outside world with which it could trade. Today Japan is no longer a nation of isolation, but ranks as a first-class nation, conscious of its strength and power, seeking commerce and trade with all nations.

Many nations have tried by force to extend their trade and commerce to increase their wealth and to secure prosperity and to avoid the isolation, that brings decay. The great cities of the United States owe their large populations and accumulated wealth to the fact that they are located on the borders of the oceans and on great lakes and rivers where they can enjoy more favorable commerce.

This proposed bill follows the Democratic platform at Chicago in 1932, upon which the Democratic Party went to the country with its nominees and won a great victory at the polls in November 1932. The authority here sought to be given to the President to enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments by which our products of farm and factory can be sold in foreign markets is the same kind of authority given by other governments to their chief executives. Shall we sit idly by and refuse to give to our President by act of Congress the needed authority to increase our commerce and the larger export of our surplus products? To refuse would be to declare for the doctrine of isolation, which has darkened every nation in the past, that has built and maintained high walls of protection against trade with other nations. To maintain these high walls is to invite retaliation and reduce our exports to foreign markets. As other nations and governments have trusted their high executives with this authority, the same power should be given our President, who will safeguard the rights of the people of the United States and all its interests and industries. Let us not take too much counsel of our fears but rather have confidence and hope that our condition may be improved by an increased sale of our foreign products.

The weak countries in all ages are those that have darkened their lands by avoiding foreign trade, and the civilized and strong nations are those that have engaged in trade and commerce with other nations. You are invited by the minority not to have confidence in the President. I am told that the Republican minority is united in opposition to this bill. This is evidenced by the Republican minority report of the Ways and Means Committee in their apparent partisan opposition. Our Republican friends have little right to complain of our President, who has been generous to them in a largely nonpartisan administration. The doctrine of isolation that they advocate for our country and their party creed, which they proclaim in their opposition to this bill, will not avail them, nor restore them to power. They may forsake the doctrines proclaimed by their great leaders, James G. Blaine, William McKinley, and Theodore Roosevelt, and they may repudiate the recent utterances of Ogden L. Mills in his speech at Topeka, Kans., and they may now seek a new cry of isolation for their party creed, and call it America self-contained, but it will not avail them. The hope of the Nation will not rest on the desert of isolation. The argument against the constitutionality of this measure, in my judgment, will break down, answered so often by the Supreme Court in passing on somewhat similar provisions in prior tariff laws. I invite your attention to that part of the majority report, which, on pages 9, 10, and 11 of said report, so fully discusses this question.

The alarming decrease in our export trade calls for action to remedy this condition. We must increase our sales or lessen our production, lessen the employment of labor, lessen the return to prosperity from the deep depression into which our country was driven after 12 years of Republican rule. Trade and commerce with all nations has been the creed and doctrine upon which our country has grown great in wealth and prosperity. Let us not abandon that healthful policy that has enabled the United States to dispose of its surplus products to meet the needs of other countries.

Reciprocal tariff agreements have been long advocated in the past by prominent statesmen of the United States. This question comes to the front now, because of the break-down in world commerce, and while other nations are seeking, through trade agreements and tariff bargaining to increase their commerce, this country should be active in increasing her commerce with foreign nations at the earliest possible date, so that the United States, by proper agreements, may dispose of her surplus products of farm and factory wherever possible. To effectuate that purpose it seems necessary by appropriate legislation to grant to the Chief Executive the power to promote foreign trade by reasonable and mutual agreements that may be beneficial and helpful to the contracting countries. Friendly trade with all nations would not only tend to increase the wealth of the trading nations but should tend to produce friendship and cordial relations and lessen the chances of war and world disturbances, and at the same time lower the high-tariff walls that destroy trade and commerce; that tend to impoverish the nations that cannot dispose of their surplus products. Discriminatory tariff rates in retaliation by one country against another should be avoided in the interest of peace and commerce.

We cannot afford to stand still and invite decay by neglecting to act, where action is necessary, or else our foreign trade may entirely disappear. Other nations are seeking new fields of commerce with other countries, and we must act quickly, and we can only do so by Executive action, and secure beneficial trade agreements by which foreign nations will purchase our surplus products rather than seek other markets.

Let me here quote brief extracts from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. The President in his message asking for this authority said:

World trade has declined with startling rapidity. Our exports in 1933 were but 52 percent of the 1929 volume and 32 percent of the 1929 value. Other governments are winning their share of international trade by negotiated reciprocal trade agreements. If American agriculture and industrial interests are to retain their deserved place in this trade the American Government must be in a position to bargain for that place by rapid and decisive negotiation. Legislation such as this is an essential step in the progress of national economic recovery.

Secretary of State Hull in his testimony before our committee quoted President McKinley, who said, "Commercial wars are unprofitable." He further stated:

The total exports of the United States fell from $5,157,000,000 in 1929 to $1,149,000,000 in 1933, while imports fell from $4,339,000,000 in 1929 to $1,122,000,000 in 1933.

He further said:

International commerce on a fair and mutually profitable basis is the greatest civilizer and peacemaker in the experience of the human race.

The whole purpose, of course, is to promote primarily our domestic prosperity—that is, the primary and paramount purpose. We must have a market for our surplus products. Secretary of Commerce Roper said:

The falling off of our foreign trade with other nations during the last 4 years has been among the major forces in paralyzing our economic system.

Mr. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, appointed by a Republican President, said:

Whatever may be said about our tariff policy, as it applied during the last 150 years, we have reached the point now where under existing conditions, if we are to keep pace with the rest of the world, we must take action similar to the action they have taken with reference to negotiating trade agreements.

Assistant Secretary of State Sayres said:

The power which this bill would grant is not in any sense a drastic departure from the power which has been exercised many times before in the history of our country by the President of the United States within the confines of power delegated to him by Congress—it is of the same kind carried on for the promotion of commerce from the earliest days. The loss of foreign markets to farmers means a lessened production, decreased acreage, and no surplus from agriculture, means also a loss to industry and closed factories, a discharge of labor, and increased unemployment.

Let us not abandon our foreign trade without a trial through Executive power to extend our needed foreign markets. Let us not withdraw our freight vessels from the high seas and tie them up in harbors there to decay, because of the end of commerce with foreign countries. If any foreign trade agreement fails to bring helpful results, it can be quickly terminated under the terms of the last section (b) of this bill, which reads as follows:

Every foreign-trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

A failure to pass this bill will be taken and understood as a want of confidence in the President of the United States. Whom the people trust with great power, Representatives in Congress can well afford to trust with reasonable power to negotiate trade agreements to increase our foreign trade. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, no one who respects the constitutional limitations which insure the orderly operation of this Government can look upon this bill, with anything but amazement and dismay.

It is amazing that the party in power should be so lacking in the sense of responsibility as to make a proposal to demoralize the operations of government. It is shocking that this outrageous proposal is made in the name of economic equilibrium and recovery.

But amazement deepens into dismay when it is realized that the Democratic Party not only intends to perpetrate this outrage upon the Constitution, but possesses the power to accomplish its purpose temporarily. During the period between enactment of this measure and the inevitable judgment that will declare it null and void, the Government, industry, and individual citizens will suffer incalculable injury.

The first and most important power conferred upon Congress is the power to lay and collect taxes and duties. This is the power of life and death, not only over the Government, but over industry and individuals. The people conferred this power upon Congress and denied it to any other agent. Congress cannot divest itself of this power while the Constitution lives. It may try to do so, but its attempt will merely lead to damage, confusion, and failure.

I indict this bill as unconstitutional to the core, because it attempts to rob Congress of its power to lay and collect duties.

The most important power of this House is the exclusive power to originate bills for raising revenue. The people require this House to determine how and to what extent they shall be taxed.

The House cannot divest itself of this authority. Congress must control all the sources of revenue. Unless the House ascertains these sources and provides for the national finances, the Government cannot endure. It would be impossible to regulate the income and expenditures of the Government if any agency other than Congress should have power to raise revenue.

This bill attempts to violate the Constitution by depriving this House of the right to originate bills for raising revenue.

We all know that the American Union was established as a result of conflicts over commerce and the impossibility of regulating foreign commerce by the separate States. The power to regulate foreign commerce is vested in Congress by the Constitution. Next to the power to tax, the regulation of commerce is perhaps the most important authority conferred upon Congress.

Yet this bill proposes to take away from Congress its power to regulate commerce. If this bill becomes law, Congress will have abdicated its power. The President will become the lawmaking power in all that pertains to commercial relations with all foreign nations. He will not only have power to raise or lower duties but he will be empowered to impose import quotas and licenses, discriminate in exchange and clearing regulations, and set up restrictions requiring that imported goods shall contain a certain proportion of domestic produce. He can raise consular and other administrative fees. He can require goods to be marked in such manner as to restrict or increase imports from certain countries. He can impose sanitary regulations as a means of regulating commerce. He can discriminate between foreign nations, favoring some and antagonizing others.

It is idle to say that Congress will have power to regulate foreign commerce after it has granted to the President these unlimited powers. Congress will be unable to determine the sum total of revenue if the President is empowered to fix the rates of duty on imported goods. He will have control over the revenue to a great extent by controlling foreign commerce.

In another vital particular this bill attempts to violate the Constitution. It proposes to transfer the treaty-making power to the Executive. I oppose this attempt with all the force at my command, because it is a furtive effort to accomplish by indirect means the destruction of the power of Congress to lay and collect duties and of the power of this House to originate bills for raising revenue.

We are denied information regarding all of the ultimate objectives of this measure; just another measure the people must not know about until it is too late. Rumor has it we have agents in Europe making deals now. One is for free cement from Belgium. How will the cement manufacturers from the Atlantic seaboard like that? Another is free lumber from Russia. How will the Northwest like that? And there are many others, all of which means destruction of American industries. Spokesmen of the administration have admitted that one of the purposes of the measure is to destroy some of the industries of the United States. How many industries are to be destroyed is not disclosed, but apparently any industry which does not produce goods as cheaply as they can be obtained from foreign countries is marked for destruction.

The Secretary of Agriculture specifically mentioned the sugar-beet industry, the cane-sugar industry, the lace-making and fine textile industry, and the toy industry as scheduled for extinction. He described them as "inefficient", and announced that all inefficient industries must be destroyed, so that more efficient foreign industries may supply this market.

This process of destruction is to be merciful, according to Secretary Wallace. Industry is to be destroyed by slow torture instead of by a single deathblow. He said:

The procedure should be slow, should be careful, taking into account the fact, we will say, for instance, that here are certain workers who have spent their whole lifetime working in a factory of this type and, if there is a rapid loss in markets for the goods produced through that factory, an injustice might be done, and that fair warning should be given.

Thank the Lord he is even that much interested in American industry.

Although Secretary Wallace admits that 5,000,000 Americans are employed in what he describes as "inefficient industries", he would destroy those industries. I call your attention to this extract from the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means on March 8:

Mr. WALLACE. I can conceive of a situation where Germany, for instance, might be willing to lower the tariff on lard in case she could move, we will say, some toys into the United States.

Mr. REED. Well, would you favor lowering the tariffs on things Germany produces and ships to this country and which we produce here in our own country?

Mr. WALLACE. If Germany can produce them more efficiently than we can, it would be of benefit to our consumers, and our consumers certainly represent the eventually dominant interest in our population. * * * Germany has a large number of small industries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are they efficient?

Mr. WALLACE. They seem to be more efficient than our own; they are willing to sell at lower prices. The Germans are undoubtedly able to sell toys for less than our people are able to sell toys. * * *

Secretary Wallace thinks they are efficient because they are willing to sell for less than we do. If Americans worked as long hours and for as low wages as the Germans, they would equal that efficiency. Or, in other words, he would reduce American labor to the same plane as German labor or destroy them entirely. And if you pass this bill he will have more to do with its administration than any other man, for he has had a taste of the taxing power through the processing tax, and would be willing to have more.

Mr. TREADWAY. You would not approve of the expansion of the growing of cane sugar in Florida?

Mr. WALLACE. I would not, unless it is an efficient industry, and it is clearly not; they cannot produce as cheaply there as they do in Cuba.

Mr. TREADWAY. They can employ American hands.

Mr. WALLACE. We will have more net material welfare if we produce things we can produce efficiently and exchange them for goods produced more efficiently elsewhere.

From this statement you can see what will happen to your sugar industry.

This astounding revolution in American financial and commercial policy is not to be a mere emergency expedient. It is to be a permanent alienation of the powers of Congress. It is to make the Executive a permanent dictator over national revenue and commerce. I deny that the language purporting to limit tariff treaties to 3 years has any such meaning. The bill makes such agreements or treaties subject to termination, but they do not automatically terminate. They remain in full force and effect unless formal notice of termination is given in advance of expiration.

The spokesmen of the administration in advocating this bill plainly give notice that it is permanent legislation. Congress is duly warned that it need not expect to recapture its powers if this bill should withstand the judicial test.

I have no doubt that this measure, if enacted, would be kicked out of court as unconstitutional, but great damage would be done in the meantime.

Secretary Hull told the Committee on Ways and Means that much could be done in executive tariff lawmaking before this bill could be made void by the courts. He said he had in mind the phases of the bill which might be unconstitutional, but he made it plain that the bill should be enacted, even if it is unconstitutional. Here is what he said:

I have in mind all these phases, but at the same time I am literally moved, driven, and kicked into another line of thinking, which related to 30,000,000 unemployed people in the world. * * *

Mr. TREADWAY. If those 30,000,000 people scattered throughout the world and their families are a first consideration, should not that clause of the Constitution be amended in order to take care of the 30,000,000 people and not to violate the Constitution directly by legislative action?

Mr. HULL. That is what they said to Abraham Lincoln when he had to suspend one or two phases for the time being.

So, ostensibly for the time being, to help 30,000,000 people in foreign countries, the Secretary of State is willing to suspend one or two phases of the Constitution.

But is Congress willing? Is the Supreme Court willing? Are the people of the United States willing to destroy the safeguards of their liberty?

We have the solemn judicial admonition of Chief Justice Taft, in the majority opinion of the United States in the case of Hampton, Jr., against United States, that—

It is a breach of the national fundamental law if Congress gives up its legislative power and transfers it to the President or to the judiciary branch.

In meeting the economic emergency let us not make a bad matter worse by violating fundamental law. Let us not create a jungle in which we would wander blindly until extricated by the Supreme Court. Let us solve emergency problems by law and not by outrage of law. Let us give to the President powers that will be effective because they are constitutional—not deceptive and futile appearances of power that cannot withstand the blast of judicial condemnation. Let us not cheat the people by pretending that relief can be given by setting aside the Constitution. While we are trying to help the people, let us not rob them of their guaranties of safety against unbridled excesses of power.

Now is the time for sane thinking, not hysterical leaps into unknown difficulties which would increase our national hardships. We cannot afford to delude ourselves or the people at this critical time. As honest legislators, we know that we cannot strip Congress of its constitutional powers. Why not be honest with ourselves and the people?

The pending bill represents the acme of Democratic inconsistencies. It is the culmination of one attack after another upon the Constitution. It is the capstone to the monument of powers abdicated by the Congress and delegated to the President. It is a complete about-face of the President and the Democratic Party.

Two years ago they sought to take from the then President his limited powers under the flexible provision of the Republican tariff act to change rates of duty and to require him to recommend to Congress any increase or decrease in duties proposed by the Tariff Commission. The Democratic Party at that time would not trust even limited powers to the President, but would require him to come to Congress for approval of his recommendations, and that party undertook to justify their position on constitutional grounds.

Now, however, they go farther in this bill by clothing the President with what is practically plenary power to make rates of duty within the limitation of 50 percent of existing rates. From the President's action there would be no appeal.

The Democratic platform of 1932 advocated "a competitive tariff for revenue", with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference. On this plank the Democratic candidate for President, now the incumbent of the White House, stood unequivocally. In his Albany speech of July 30, 1932, he said:

It is a difficult and highly technical matter to determine standards and costs of production abroad and at home. A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts, but not to dictate policies. The facts should be left to speak for themselves free from Presidential interference.

Note that the Democratic platform and the Democratic candidate were both opposed to "Presidential interference", and yet within the brief period of 2 years we find the President changing front on this question just as he changed front on his promise to preserve "a sound currency at all hazards."

In proposing the delegation of the autocratic power conferred by this bill, the President undertakes to give assurance "that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed."

When we remember the assurance given us by the President that he would administer the Economy Act with justice and sympathy toward veterans, which assurance caused many of us to support that measure, we cannot now but wonder what reliance may be placed in this latest assurance when we realize that by this bill you are placing the fate and destiny of our entire commercial structure in the hands of one man—power to use in his discretion. I declare and challenge successful contradiction that this is the first time in all our history that such grant of power has been proposed without recourse to Congress for approval of Presidential acts.

When the Democratic Party in this House 2 years ago sought to wrest from President Hoover his authority under the present law, they argued in favor of the prerogatives of Congress under the Constitution. Foremost was the able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. What my friend said then is even more applicable today in respect to the pending bill. He said:

Here in this body and in the body at the other end of the Capitol under the Constitution are joined the powers to devise and frame legislation affecting the revenues of this country and its domestic and foreign economic policies as far as they are affected by the tariff. This bill . . . is but a return to the Congress of the United States of that original power and jurisdiction affecting these measures which, in my opinion, should never have been taken away from it and vested exclusively in the Executive of this country (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1508).

That is what my friend from Alabama said when we had a Republican President. I am waiting with much interest to see what he will say and how he will vote on the present bill affecting a Democratic President. Let us see who is playing politics.

Likewise, my genial friend, my colleague from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, joined the gentleman from Alabama in protecting the constitutional rights of Congress.

Since Woodrow Wilson—

He said—

the Democratic Party has stood for the proposition of taking the tariff out of politics and against the other extreme of putting it up there in the Executive Mansion (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1510).

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], the present Democratic whip, was equally vehement. He said:

The travesty in any tariff law, I think, has been to delegate the authority with reference to the creation of tariff duties and tax legislation to the Executive Department. I think it is contrary to the traditions of our Government, although the Supreme Court may have ruled that it is constitutional; still as a traditional policy of our country, I, as one Democrat, think I voice the sentiment of the majority of my party—I am opposed to the President of the United States enacting tariff duties or tariff fundamentals. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1511.)

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], a present member of the Ways and Means Committee, complained bitterly against delegating tariff authority to the President and the supine relinquishment of legislative power to the Executive.

We do not advocate—

He exclaimed—

autocracy and bureaucracy, yet there are men who permit their growth in the name of expediency. . . . The Fathers who wrote the Constitution never contemplated the placing of the power to fix rates in the hands of the President. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 8, 1932, p. 1538.)

But, Mr. Chairman, these expressions from our Democratic friends in the last Congress were but feeble echoes of the implications and denunciations hurled at the flexible provision of the Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930.

With no intention to further embarrass our Democratic friends, but with a view to refreshing their memories, let me quote briefly from the remarks of some of our distinguished Democratic friends made upon this floor at that time. We then had with us the present distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, for whom I have profound regard and respect. Judge Hull regarded flexible tariff provisions as "subversive of the plain functions of Congress" and an "unjustifiable arrogance of power and authority to the President."

Later on, in another body, he referred to the power granted to the President as a—

Vast and uncontrolled power larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of the Government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

And yet today we find our able Secretary of State advocating the passage of the pending bill, of which I might say he is the chief proponent.

The present Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the genial gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGLTON], was also solicitous for observing the constitutional rights of Congress. He said:

The fathers who framed the Constitution, wisely, in my opinion, left to Congress the initiating and enacting of laws raising revenue. The flexible provision giving the President the power to raise or lower tariff rates to the amount of 50 percent renders nugatory in spirit and practical effect this provision of the Constitution. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 17, 1929, p. 1474.)

In the same tenor spoke our distinguished Democratic friend, the former Speaker of the House, Mr. Garner; our friend the former Member from Georgia, Mr. Crisp; Judge Ragon, of Arkansas; the late lamented Mr. Collier, from Mississippi; and other prominent Democrats, whose remarks I will not now take the time to quote, but will insert them in the RECORD at this point.

HON. HARRY C. CANFIELD

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 17, 1929, p. 1484)

In my opinion, what is even worse than the raising of tariff schedules beyond all reason is the continuing of the flexible clause that is in the present law; and, in addition to that, in this bill you have given power to the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates to determine the value of any import brought into this country.

If this bill is passed, you will surrender the rights of Congress, to the executive branch of the Government, and will destroy the right of the judiciary, as far as customs are concerned.

I am a believer in the Tariff Commission. I believe this body should be a nonpartisan, fact-finding body; and I also believe that after this body has made a thorough examination of any rate that is not satisfactory that these facts should be turned over to Congress and on these findings of fact the Congress should act.

HON. CHARLES F. CRISP

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 15, 1929, p. 1349)

Gentlemen, think what a potential power the power to make tariff rates would be in an election year, to let the President of the United States have the right to write a tariff bill. Stop and think about it. Do you think there would be any dearth of campaign contributions?

O gentlemen, you are surrendering your right under the Constitution. Our forefathers fought for that right—the right that the elected Members of the people, the Representatives of the people, should alone have to levy taxes against them. [Applause.] And here you are surrendering it; and when you have surrendered it, do not expect that you will get it back soon. If you should surrender this power and should pass a law to repeal it, the President could veto it, and it would take a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress to override that veto, and it is seldom that either of the two great political parties in our country has a two-thirds vote in both branches of Congress.

O gentlemen, do not let the political exigencies of this case induce you to permit another entering wedge into the shrine of the Government as outlined by our forefathers, under which this Nation has grown and prospered until today it is the most powerful, the wealthiest, and most highly respected nation on earth.

HON. CORDELL HULL

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 13, 1929, p. 1212)

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on the basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

HON. JOHN N. GARNER

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1929, p. 1080)

I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes.

Remember this, gentlemen: When the legislative body surrenders its tariff power and its obligations to the Executive—under our system of government a majority can do that, but you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate.

Remember that when you surrender this power of taxation you surrender it for all time to come or until the two bodies by a two-thirds vote can take it away from the Executive.

If an ambitious man is in the White House, he will not surrender it. If a wise and patriotic man is in the White House, he may have a want of confidence in the Congress, so neither of them would be willing to give up the power.

This is what you have in this bill: First, you have surrendered your right for an indefinite period to raise or lower the rates, because there will be no occasion for another tariff bill until the American people rebel against the iniquity of what I believe to be the highest and most indefensible bill ever imposed upon the statute books. And you make the Secretary of the Treasury the absolute arbiter, and you have taken away from the courts the opportunity of the parties affected going into court and having them review the action of the Treasury Department.

HON. HENRY T. RAINET

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 9, 1932, p. 1595)

This bill increases your power; it gives you more authority over the tariff reductions or tariff increases; it takes away the idea that you can correct the tariff by raising it 50 percent or lowering it 50 percent.

It takes away from the President the power that you gave him in order to avoid the responsibilities of the office to which you were elected. This bill will place more work on this House, and you are to do that in order to earn the salaries you are receiving. If you do not, the time will come when the electorate will demand that the salaries of Members of Congress be reduced until they are commensurate with the service that you actually render. You cannot render service by shirking responsibilities and by shirking work in these matters. We are giving back to you the authority over your own tariff.

Now, here is the best and most complete of all arguments against giving this plenary power to the President to fix duties and to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries.

This was made when the Democrats in Congress were "all het up" over the proposal for a flexible provision in the tariff.

But before I read this let me here explain the exact difference between the Republican proposal then made and now the law and the Democratic proposal contained in this bill.

Ours was that the President could raise or lower to the extent of 50 percent the existing duty on any imported article—upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission—after ascertaining facts. Keep that in mind, after ascertaining the facts, where all interested parties had an opportunity to be heard. Nothing secret or covered up.

What is the Democratic proposal? That the President can do this without the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, without any ascertainment of facts or consultation of interested parties, but just according to his dictation. And added to that is the right to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries, and none of these agreements are in any way subject to legislative review.

This is the official record of a protest made on September 30, 1929, against the flexible-tariff plan by the then Democratic minority in the Senate Finance Committee. Signed by Senator PAT HARRISON, Democrat, Mississippi, present chairman of the committee, and now in charge of the Roosevelt legislation. The protest was seconded by the following Senators, all Democrats: Senators KING, Utah; GEORGE, Georgia; WALSH, Massachusetts; BARKLEY, Kentucky; THOMAS, Oklahoma; and CONNALLY, Texas, each still Members of the Senate.

The interesting historical document reads:

A question of far-reaching consequences transcending consideration of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called "flexible provisions" of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive, unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of the right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

The statement then further attacks the flexible-tariff proposal, and continues:

The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character, is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

Calling attention to their attempts to secure Tariff Commission responsibility for the tariff changes, the Democrats declared:

For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary, and what we believe to be unconstitutional, authority passes now from the Congress it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important question, we make this appeal.

It will be interesting to note what these same distinguished gentlemen will say about this much further reaching proposal of President Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, never have I known of nor do I think there ever was a more complete stultification of views upon a fundamental question than is exhibited in the bill under consideration on the part of our Democratic friends.

For in this bill sent here by the President Congress is commanded to surrender absolutely to one man, without let or hindrance, the sole power to arbitrarily make tariff rates. Neither the industries to be affected nor labor in those industries will be vouchsafed even a hearing. We will not know what the rates are until they are proclaimed by the President.

I invite your attention to the statement made by Mr. Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, on March 6, 1934, just 2 weeks ago, at the Bar Association of New York City. Mr. Woll said:

In venturing into and applying the method of process of trade treaties with foreign governments it is essential that workers should have an opportunity to be heard. It is equally important that participation of labor, as at present made possible and available, through an appeal to Congress and through direct representation on the Tariff Commission, should in no way be lessened, but be increased.

Mr. Woll, in the same statement, with which I heartily agree, urged the enlargement of our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets. On this point he said:

As against all these urgencies for increased export trade, reciprocal trade treaties, and other devices to that end, America's wage earners raise the more important issue of enlarging our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets.

Government statistics clearly indicate more than 92 percent of the products of American labor and American agriculture are consumed in America. While this is an average figure of all commodities and include such important commodities as cotton, which is widely exported, it does indicate how great a domestic market we have in our own free-trade area. This great American consumption of American goods is largely due to the high standards of life and work which prevail in our country and have been established in the main through the untiring efforts of American organized labor. Our present problem is, rather, that of extending this home consuming power, in view of the constant losses which our producers of cotton, wheat, lumber, and other products have suffered and will increasingly suffer in the world markets by reason of a constantly growing competition from other nations.

Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of reciprocal tariff agreements such as were contemplated under the McKinley and Dingley tariff laws which would not be disadvantageous to our domestic market but upon terms representing true reciprocity, I am unalterably opposed to opening our markets to foreign-made goods by bartering away our American industry.

What we need, in my judgment, is restoration of confidence by removing the uncertainty surrounding our currency; by taking business out of the strait-jacket into which it is encased; by true economy; by stopping profligate expenditures; and by balancing the National Budget.

I am too much wedded to our American home market to stand by and see it destroyed by the invasion of products from the Old World, even though it were possible to restore our export trade by opening wide our doors to foreign-made goods.

I am opposed to any discrimination in this onslaught upon our home producers. The depression through which we have gone and are still going, despite all the proposed remedies of the new deal, was not caused by the present tariff law so bitterly condemned by our Democratic friends, but which they have not had the courage to change; that law has stood as a bulwark against more aggravated depression by protecting our industries and the labor employed by them and from ravishment and destruction by an influx of foreign-made goods seeking the best market in the world. We could not continue to produce from foreigners if foreigners are to produce for us. We must not at this time seek foreign markets at the expense of American consumers, nor yield our markets to foreign goods at the expense of the American wage earner. American wages is the hub of the tariff question from the American viewpoint.

The question is one of wages, reduction of wages, or no wages, and it matters little what cause contributed to their present level. Such causes could create but they could not maintain in the face of foreign invasion. In mistaken zeal for export trade we must not lose sight of the fundamental question of wages and the standard of living in this country.

Again I agree with Mr. Matthew Woll, representing the American Federation of Labor, when he said in the statement to which I referred a moment ago:

Is it possible that those who favor entering into reciprocal tariff treaties with foreign nations expect that those nations, where weekly hours exceeding 50 and 60 per week are not uncommon, are going to permit Americans to dictate to them what legislation or laws they shall enact for their people?

Unless this can be done, is it reasonable to suppose the products of American industries, with America's industrial workers producing for not more than 30 or 35 or even 40 hours per week, with wages which will permit of their retaining the American standards of living, can compete in the American market with products of foreign countries?

Unless it is intended to scrap the N.I.R.A. and force America's industrial workers to compete on an almost equal footing with the low-wage workers of Europe and Asia, there is no possible benefit to accrue from the fundamental change of government and new tariff policy proposed and involved.

Mr. Chairman, a favorite shibboleth of the Democratic Party throughout its vacillating history on the tariff question, one and the only one to which they have consistently adhered, is, "Capture the markets of the world." If they want to capture the world markets, why do they not have the courage to tell us openly and honestly how they propose to do it? Why this secrecy? Are you ashamed of your program?

When I recall the words of that distinguished statesman, the former Speaker of the House, Thomas B. Reed, and his homely illustration of Aesop's fable of the dog who lost his succulent shoulder of mutton by glibly jumping for the reflection in the stream, the question then, as now, was whether the tariff be lowered in order to open the markets of the world to American products.

The markets of the world—

Said Mr. Reed—

how broad and cold these words are. They stretch from the frozen regions of the North Pole across the blazing Tropics, to the high-bound shores of the Antarctic Continent—all this we can have if we will but give up the little handbreadth called the United States of America.

To hear these rhetoricians declaim you would imagine the markets of the world a vast vacuum waiting till now for American goods to break through, rush in, and fill the yawning void.

The dog in Aesop's Fables—

Mr. Reed said—

trotted along and looked over the side of the brink and he saw the markets of the world and dived for them. A minute after he was crawling up the bank the wettest, the sickest, the nastiest, and most muttonless dog that ever swam ashore.

Mr. Chairman, wherein would the American workingman advantage if we gain the world markets and he loses his job? We who believe in the principle of protection welcome discussion of the tariff question at any time, but the country expected that after the unbridled and vociferous maledictions and condemnation heaped upon the Hawley-Smoot Act by our Democratic friends in the last campaign, charging it with being responsible for the depression, there would at least be some attempt on their part when in control of the Government as they are now, to revise the rates of duty in that act in accordance with their widely proclaimed intention so to do.

When we asked you in the Seventy-second Congress why you did not act, you told us the reason you did not present your tariff program was because of a Republican President and it would not get anywhere. What is your excuse now? You have undisputed control of both branches of Congress and your own President, who sees eye to eye with you on the tariff. You do not have the courage in the face of the coming elections to tell the people of this country what the articles are on which you propose to reduce the tariff. The only thing you have the courage to say now is, "Let George do it."

And instead of applying yourselves to that task as you had solemnly promised in your platform and in your speeches on the stump, the only interest you have displayed in the subject has been two bills—the one in the last Congress to which I have referred, restoring to Congress its power to legislate on the subject of the tariff, and the other the pending bill, neither of which changed or proposes to change any tariff rate by Congress itself.

It is obvious, therefore, that the reckless denunciation of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was mere vaporous hypocrisy. The distinguished Speaker of the House, Mr. RAINEY, replying to the taunts that his party had failed to carry out their threat or to fulfill their promise to reduce tariff rates, replied, dramatically:

Lower this tariff drastically? You (Republicans) will not do it, and we (Democrats) do not dare to do it with conditions as they are. We do not want this market flooded with products of cheap labor in other countries.

What Speaker RAINEY so well said at that time we Republicans say now. We do not want this country flooded with cheap, foreign-made goods. Whether tariff rates be reduced by Congress or by dictum of the President, we will not sell our birthright—the American market—for a foreign mess of pottage.

Mr. Chairman, in this bill sent here by the President a supine, spineless, sycophantic Congress is commanded to surrender absolutely to one man—the President of the United States—without let or hindrance, the sole power, arbitrarily to make tariff rates. I repeat that no such astounding and amazing grant of power ever before was requested, suggested, or dreamed of in all of our history and political philosophy.

It constitutes an affront to the Congress, the peoples' chosen representatives, and is an invitation to them to violate their oath of office which each man here has taken to support and defend the Constitution.

It is an insult to our intelligence and a brazen, arrogant, and presumptuous assault upon a constitutional power which alone resides in the Congress of the United States; and no exigency, real or fancied, nor can any plea of emergency condone, justify, or mitigate its evil purposes and consequences.

It is proposed not only to rob the Senate of its constitutional prerogative to ratify treaties, but it also takes away from the Congress its authority to raise revenue, for it has been recognized that in the making of tariff treaties the House of Representatives, where revenue bills must originate, has coequal power with the Senate. This power belongs to the Senate and House of Representatives jointly to authorize negotiations of tariff treaties; and to the Senate alone to ratify such treaties; and this power cannot be taken away except by due constitutional process of amendment to the Constitution. Neither can it be superseded even on the plea of emergency.

In this connection I am pleased to quote the words of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Said he in discussing the proposed emergency clause of the so-called "Black bill":

A constitutional government such as we have is the expression of the will of the people crystallized into the Constitution; and no power can change or suspend it except the power which makes it, and that is the people of the United States. It is the difference between a government of law and a government of men; between that of a republic, a democracy, and that of a dictatorship. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence.

No power exists anywhere, in the Congress or in the courts, or in any body which Congress can create, to change the Constitution, either by suspension or otherwise, * * * not for 1 hour. If for 1 hour, it could be for 1 or 10 years. If for a day, it might be for 4 years, as in Germany, where all constitutional government, all forms of a republic, have been made to give way to a dictatorship.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is agreed that Alexander Hamilton was in favor of a strong central government. It is a popular, although fallacious, idea that Hamilton, if he could have had his way, preferred a military form of government with a strong iron hand at the head. Be that as it may, he was jealous in his advocacy for the adoption of the Constitution as written in the convention. Among the great arguments for its adoption which he set forth in the Federalist Papers is one on the treaty-making power of the Executive, which should arrest our attention and careful thought at this time.

Hamilton wrote:

The President is to have power "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

However proper or safe it may be in governments where the executive magistrate is a hereditary monarch to commit to him the entire power to make treaties, it would be utterly unsafe and improper to intrust that power to an elective magistrate for 4 years' duration. * * * An ambitious man might make his own aggrandizement, by the aid of a foreign power, the price of his treachery to his constituents. The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world to the sole disposal of a magistrate created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.

Is the Congress, having become accustomed to the transfer of its constitutional powers to the Chief Magistrate, abjectly to complete the job, empty itself of all power and surrender complete obedience to the President? The answer to this question may be found in a succession of acts since March 4, 1933, by which Congress, little by little, abdicated its powers and conferred them upon the Executive. This legislative Caesarian food of questionable constitutionality has whetted the appetite of the President for more and greater powers until in the pending monstrous proposition we have the culmination of one assault after another upon the vitals of our republican form of government. This is not a partisan view of the proposed encroachment. It is shared in by thinking men and women of this Republic who hold dear our constitutional form of government.

Listen to what a distinguished Democratic Senator from North Carolina, Senator BAILEY, had to say upon this subject:

The Republic is not going by arms. * * * She is not going by sedition and conspiracy. This Republic will go when American liberty goes, in every step we take, giving way here and giving way there, negating personal liberty, almost unawares—here and here, there and there, forgetting the great traditions of the past that ought to guide us, forgetting the great standards by means of which the Republic has ever lived and must live, forgetting the spiritual fountains that have made her the source of light and life for 144 years. When we forget, when we cease to exercise vigilance, we begin to see the Republic taking a transformation and losing a character which amounts to more than revolution.

Yet and still, this patriotic appeal, this wise Democratic admonition goes unheeded, and however much or blandly the President's subservient apologists may disclaim his desire for a dictatorship, there is evidence in this latest proposed surrender to him that we are rushing headlong toward absolutism. Already you have placed in his hands the destiny of American industry, American labor, and American agriculture, and the welfare of 125,000,000 subjects in the domestic field, and now he asks or commands that you grant him unbridled, unrestrained power in the domain of international commerce to determine rates of duty—which he calls a tax—on the imports of foreign goods into the American market in competition with the products of American labor and of the American farmer.

With this power the question of international debts is so closely interwoven, that the President will tell you later, that to accomplish my full purpose—to fully support my position—you must grant me the further power to settle international debts. And if Congress is as supine then as you are now, it will not have the courage to refuse.

Every American citizen ought to stand aghast at such a proposal, and their representatives in the Congress of the United States ought to respond to the President's demand for omnipotency by an emphatic "no" that will reecho throughout the bounds of this Republic and awaken its citizens to the sense of their insecurity and to the imminent destruction of their constitutional liberties.

It is high time, Mr. Chairman, that the American people exercise vigilance and hold fast to their form of government before it is altogether too late. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, much has been said in regard to this tariff question, and if I were to talk all the afternoon, probably, I would not say anything particularly new.

We have heard these arguments throughout the years. It occurs to me that in one sense of the word the measure before us is not a tariff measure. It is a delegation of power to fix tariffs to the President of the United States. So that we are not dealing with a tariff measure, in the sense of fixing rates, but on the other hand, it is the most far-reaching tariff measure ever before any Congress, because of the power which it gives the President.

If the time had come when I believed the Congress should delegate this power, I still would be opposed to delegating the power to this particular administration, and my reason for this can best be illustrated in the following manner: If I had a child that I was not able to raise in my own home, in seeking a place for this child I would seek out a home that loved children, that had at heart their welfare and wanted to bring them forward as good citizens. I would not seek a home where they did not care for children and thought there were too many children in the world already. This illustrates the reason I would not delegate this authority to this particular administration.

The President of the United States is listening to the "brain trust." He is listening to professors in respect to this matter. These men are opposed to protection for any industry. I want to call your attention to just one little bit of testimony taken before the Committee on Agriculture. Mr. Weaver, one of these professors from the Agriculture Department, was before that committee and he said, in talking about the sugar bill, that it is the policy of the administration to eliminate the industry before it gets any bigger, and Mr. Tugwell, who followed him, was asked whether or not he approved and whether or not that was the attitude of the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Tugwell, referring to Mr. Weaver, said:

I think he believes that no industry is entitled to support by tariffs, and I may say, personally, that I agree with him. I see no reason why it should be.

I am not willing to trust the tariff-making power of this country to an administration that has no sympathy whatever with the protective tariff under which we have lived in this country.

The sugar bill, to which I have referred for the last few days, has apparently been shelved and I am wondering if this is because of the fact that if the pending bill is enacted, then the administration can do all that it had intended to do to the sugar industry by and under and by virtue of that law, and will not need the enactment of the sugar bill which has been before the Committee on Agriculture.

This pending measure gives authority to the President of the United States overnight the power to summarily reduce tariffs 50 percent without any hearing before any commission and without consultation with anybody. In other words, he can deal with this question just as he dealt with the air-mail contracts, and I am going to venture the assertion that there has not been any action of this administration that has caused the straight-thinking business people of the country to lose confidence in it more than has the canceling of all air-mail contracts without a hearing involving as it does the welfare of thousands of our citizens. The people are waiting, and not any too patiently, an opportunity to express their disapproval of any further delegation of power that belongs to this Congress to the President of the United States. Pass this bill and you give to Professor Tugwell and others that much more of a free hand to put into effect in this country their doctrines of socialism and communism.

I represent largely an agricultural district. I have been unable to figure out where, by any trade agreements that this bill authorizes the President to enter into, any benefit can come to agriculture. In other words, the products that would come in here would no doubt be the raw products that would more or less compete with agricultural products and we would send out manufactured articles and the farmer would be the sufferer under such legislation. [Applause.] I am unwilling to commit the authority to fix tariff rates into the hands of the traditional enemies of the protective tariff.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill, H.R. 8687, reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee, is in response to a message of the President of the United States sent to Congress on March 2, 1934, and is a most important administration measure.

On this bill, as has been the case on previous tariff measures, the two great political parties of this country are definitely divided. That was to be expected, because that is in keeping with the history and traditions of these great parties in this Nation. The 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee divided exactly along party lines. The 15 majority members voted for the measure and the 10 minority members voted against it.

In approaching the discussion of this subject it is important that we bear in mind conditions which makes such legislation necessary. A few days more than a year ago the Democratic Party assumed control of the affairs of this Government of ours after the Republican Party had been in control of the affairs of our Nation for 12 years.

Without entering into any discussion as to the reasons, or without attempting to assign the causes, it might be well for us to remind ourselves in passing of some conditions that existed in this Nation of ours at that time.

The industry of this Nation was paralyzed, the wheels of commerce were ceasing to turn, and agriculture was bleeding at every pore. The American farmers were receiving the lowest prices for their commodities than had been received in the recorded history of our Nation.

From twelve to fifteen million of American citizens were anxiously walking the streets and highways of this land vainly seeking an opportunity to work and make a living for themselves and their families. At the very hour when the newly elected President of the Nation stood before this Capitol to take the oath of office the banks of practically all the States of the Union were closed. The business of this Nation was paralyzed, and we were in the worst economic condition we have ever found ourselves in the history of the country.

Now, with that situation existing throughout the length and breadth of this country, this great President of ours, who had been chosen as the leader of the American people, came forward with a recovery program. He reminded the Congress of the necessary enactment of certain legislation which was designed and intended to improve conditions and effectuate recovery in the affairs of this country of ours and in the affairs of the American people.

During the last year legislation has been passed as a part of this recovery program, which conferred on the President of the United States certain broad discretionary authority insofar as the domestic affairs of this country are concerned. The passing of these various measures conferred on the President broad discretionary authority with reference to the internal or domestic affairs of the people of this country.

The pending bill simply goes one step further in this recovery program and confers upon the President of the United States the same type of broad discretionary authority insofar as our international trade relations are concerned. That is the purpose of this bill and is exactly what it does.

It might be well for us to remind ourselves of some of the conditions that exist in this and other countries of the world as we determine the question of the feasibility of enacting legislation of this type.

Let us for a moment think of the world-trade conditions. During recent years the world has been experiencing a period of acute economic distress and suffering.

The President, addressing the Congress, speaking of the decline of world trade, had this to say:

Measured in terms of the volume of goods in 1933, it has been reduced to approximately 70 percent of the 1929 volume. Measured in terms of dollars, it has fallen to 35 percent.

Then the Secretary of State, appearing before the Committee on Ways and Means when this bill was under consideration, made this statement:

According to reliable estimates, if world trade had gone forward with the annual ratio of gain existing before the war, the nations during the intervening years would have had some $275,000,000,000 more than they have actually enjoyed; and according to these estimates, if world trade had thus progressed, there would be today an annual international commerce of nearly $50,000,000,000 instead of the pitiable figure of less than $12,000,000,000 for 1933. International trade has steadily grown less each year since 1929. The reduction of international trade in the amount of $40,000,000,000 means a reduction of the world production by $40,000,000,000, and this means a reduction in consumption of a like amount, and this means correspondingly low standards of living.

That was the expression of the Secretary of State as he appeared before the committee giving us an idea of the world economic conditions as they exist today.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The Secretary of State is, of course, a very distinguished and charming and able gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman cannot too highly compliment the Secretary of State, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. CULKIN. He served here in the House, and at that time, as I recall him, he was distinctly an avowed free trader. He did not believe in any tariff.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I seriously doubt whether the distinguished gentleman from New York has a right to so characterize the Secretary of State.

Mr. CULKIN. That is the way I construed his attitude. The gentleman from Tennessee is making a most delightful speech, and I dislike to interrupt him, but what I am interested in is how we are going to deal with a case like that of Japan under the favored-nation clause. In Japan men get as little as 12 cents a day and women 7 cents a day. How is the gentleman going to handle a situation like that under this proposed measure?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman compliments me. I am not going to execute this law. If I should have that duty assigned to me, I would certainly make a most careful investigation into all existing conditions and circumstances, and if I had the opportunity to meet Japan across the table, I would try to make the best possible trade I could for the people of this country, and I have no doubt that that is what the President of the United States will do under the authority of this measure.

Mr. CULKIN. Then I assume the gentleman would favor the Japanese workman getting more pay?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I would be delighted to see them get more pay.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the United States should be unable to negotiate a reciprocal trade agreement of advantage to us, certainly we would not in that case be in any worse condition than we are now.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It should always be borne in mind that the President of the United States representing the whole people of the United States, and who enjoys as great a degree of confidence of the people of this country as has ever been enjoyed by any man, when he sits down at the table with the representative of another country, will endeavor to do the best he can for the people of this country. It is not within the realms of probability that he is going to forget the welfare and interest of the American people. Furthermore, as suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL], unless the type and kind of trade agreement that does impress him as being to the interest and advantage of the people of this country can be made, he simply does not have to trade at all.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has noted the suggestion of the administration or some of the gentlemen in the administration of the Agricultural Department urging a reduction in the production of beet sugar in America. I assume that the gentleman is in favor of that?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; the distinguished gentleman from New York is not undertaking to quote me on the beet-sugar industry because I have given no utterance on the subject.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that these tariff negotiations must result in that sort of bargaining?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Not at all. I have heard some statements made here during the course of this debate upon what different officials of the Government may have said on the beet-sugar question and other questions, but it is rather significant to me to note that none of those who, in all probability, will have charge of the administration of this measure have been quoted in that connection. Of course, these trade agreements are to be negotiated by the President of the United States. Naturally international affairs are conducted through the State Department. Somebody has quoted some third or fourth or fifth assistant or some other subordinate in the Agricultural Department. There is nothing here to indicate that he would have any voice in these affairs at all. I commend to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture himself when he appeared before the committee. He said, in substance, as I now recall it: "I say now, as I have on all other occasions, so far as the sugar question is concerned, that I do not think our production of cane and beet sugar should be further expanded in this country"; and that is as far as he went, and he stated that that is as far as he has gone at any time.

As one who tried to place a fair construction on the statements of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, and every other witness who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, I say to the gentleman that I got no impression that the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind to do any such things or attempt to do any such things as gentlemen on the floor here have indicated they are fearful he might do.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Briefly, if you please.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman states that the negotiation of these tariff treaties will be in the hands of the Secretary of State?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I said to the gentleman that, of course, international relations are, in the very nature of things, primarily the functions of the State Department.

Mr. CULKIN. And it involves very difficult and intricate negotiation. The President, of course, could not do that individually; but what I wish to ask the gentleman is, if it is not a fact that the difference between Professor Moley, the distinguished editor of Today, and the present distinguished Secretary of State lies in the fact that Professor Moley was for a vigorous nationalism and the present Secretary of State is for an internationalism; is that not true?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York has the same right to form his opinions as to what differences may have existed between those gentlemen as I have. I am not disposed to enter into any discussion of any differences that may have developed between the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary of State. That is a matter aside from this question.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I had not thought to interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee. I am very much interested in what he has to say, and I should not have interrupted him if he had not yielded to others. I want to ask the gentleman if he seriously believes that the President of the United States, with all the present duties of that office devolving upon him, will have time to personally negotiate treaties or make the investigations that are necessary if we are to enter into trade agreements upon a basis that will be equitable to the people of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I submit to my distinguished colleague from Michigan that the bill itself speaks on that point in the language contained on page 2, as he well knows, for I recall that he asked the same question many times during the hearings. On page 2, lines 9 and 10:

The President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States—

And so forth.

The language of this act is what you and I have to vote on. The provisions of the bill itself are what we answer "yea" or "nay" on when the Clerk calls our names. That is what the bill provides. I have no doubt that the President of the United States will faithfully perform the trust that is imposed in him by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And the gentleman is not afraid that the President of the United States will make any trade or agreement that will be detrimental to the people of this country?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Not at all; no, sir; and I hope to touch upon that point in a few moments, if I may use a little of my time.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield for one further question, and then I will not ask him to yield further, unless he expresses a desire to be very generous to other Members in yielding. I want to ask my friend if this bill, along with the other powers which it extends to the President, will create additional time at the disposal of the President of the United States in which he may give proper consideration to the great duties devolving upon him under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I respectfully submit to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan that the answer I have endeavored to give him is a fair answer to that question and includes the question which he has very kindly submitted to me.

Mr. FORD. May I answer that question for the gentleman?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Who thought that the President of the United States would be called upon to settle the automobile trouble in this country, and that he would be able to find time for that? Who has the temerity to say that he did not do a good job of it? [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, and then I must decline to yield further.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am asking this question, not to embarrass the gentleman but to get some information that will enable me to act intelligently upon this bill. I am worried about the effect of the so-called "favored-nation" treaties.

Suppose, for instance, the President should find it desirable to make a treaty with Sweden, which manufactures matches, permitting the exchange of American commodities, say, wheat for matches, upon a reciprocal basis? Japan, I understand, has a treaty containing the favored-nations clause. Would the entering into of a treaty with Sweden automatically authorize or permit Japan to enjoy the same privilege that we give to Sweden under the operation of the favored-nation clauses?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I assume my distinguished colleague understands the operation of the favored-nation treaties.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If I understood that fully, I would not have asked the question.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I may not be able to fully answer the gentleman in the time I have, but my conception of it is that when different nations enter into those treaties with the so-called "favored-nation" clause in the treaty—and I might say that we have 48 of that type treaties now—it simply means that a provision is contained therein to the effect that if you accord certain treatment to other nations you are bound to accord similar treatment to me as one of the nations having negotiated a favored-nation treaty with you.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. So, if we accorded to Sweden the privilege of exporting matches to the United States with a reduction of 50 percent in the duty upon those matches, automatically the duty upon matches from Japan would be reduced 50 percent also, despite the fact that, of course, Japanese laborers receive very much less pay than the laborers in Sweden?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, our distinguished colleague may apply the interpretation which I have endeavored to give him, as I understood it, to any condition existing in the nations of the world.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I know the gentleman will not have time to answer all of these questions in detail, and I commend the gentleman from Minnesota that he take the hearings at page 365 and following pages, where the Assistant Secretary of State went into that question and explained it rather fully.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. Chairman, as I was endeavoring to touch briefly upon the situation of world-trade conditions at the time I was interrupted by these various questions, I should like to return for the moment to that subject in order that we may have very definitely in mind some of the conditions existing throughout the world that impressed me at least with the importance of this country giving consideration to these conditions, and especially as they apply to the trade of this country.

The total exports of the United States fell from $5,241,000,000 in 1929 to $1,675,000,000 in 1933, while the imports fell from $4,399,000,000 in 1929 to $1,449,000,000 in 1933. The decline in American commerce has steadily continued.

The point is that in this great shrinkage of world trade we are not only losing in the same proportion as other nations of the world but we are losing at a greater rate than the other countries of the world. Many of the markets we are now losing, of course, are being taken by other countries of the world. Under our present arrangement and under conditions as they now exist, we have not been able to hold our own in world trade affairs.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I would prefer not to yield unless it is for a question along this particular line.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The question I wish to ask is on this particular point. In the gentleman's opinion what effect does the increased cost of production in this country have on the diminution of our foreign trade, which trade we are losing to countries having lower costs of production? In other words, the cost of products manufactured in France is more nearly on a par with the cost of products manufactured in Italy than is the cost of products manufactured in the United States, because of our high wage scale, high cost of living, and our high standard of living. Does not the gentleman feel that one reason for the higher cost of our products is our standard of living, and does this not have some effect upon international trade?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I say to the gentleman very frankly that I have no doubt the points mentioned by him enter into the picture and have some bearing on it, of course, but I do not think they are the controlling elements by any means. Many phases of the matter must be taken into consideration.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The increased cost of production under the N.R.A. is offset almost equally by the depreciation of the dollar.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, that is true. The question of the value of the dollar and other matters related to it naturally enter into a consideration of this whole subject.

Now, passing for a moment, if I may, to the question of our diminished share of this world trade, I shall call attention briefly to a few figures that indicate the true situation on this point.

The American share of the import trade of the world in 1929 amounted to 12.19 percent; and our share of the export trade of the world in that same year amounted to 15.61 percent. In 1932 the American share had fallen to 9.58 percent of the imports of the world, and to 12.39 percent of the exports.

In other words, whereas in 1929 the United States enjoyed 13.83 percent of the total world trade, in 1932 its share had fallen to 10.92 percent.

This reflects the situation that exists today insofar as the international trade affairs of our country are concerned.

One very important thing for us to bear in mind is the ever-increasing tendency of the other nations of the world to equip themselves with the necessary machinery to meet quickly the changing trade conditions of the world. They are resorting to all types of devices and what might be characterized as schemes to hold their own in this competition for international trade, and we are simply to be left behind because under our system we are not equipped with the necessary machinery to keep pace with the others in this competition for international trade.

The Secretary of State, I now recall, told the committee that of the 65 countries of the world practically all have some form of trade barriers. The practice of erecting trade barriers is continuing and increasing all the time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I also recall that during the hearings it was shown to your committee that some 68 or 69 tariff-quota agreements have been made by European countries since January of last year, showing the ever-increasing tendency of these other countries of the world to enter into trade agreements and quotas and arrangements among themselves and constantly to erect trade barriers. Thus we find it difficult to undertake international trade with them.

Reference has been made several times to different countries that may have something to export to us. As I endeavored to point out a few moments ago, I have no doubt at all that the President of the United States is going to consider the interest of all the American people and of the industries of this country when these trade agreements are negotiated and entered into.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Admitting the interest, of course, of the President in protecting American industries, will the gentleman not be good enough to point out to us what particular articles he considers will be used to increase our importations?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I say to our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts that I am not prepared at the moment to do that. I would not do it if I had the information. I do not think it is a sound business principle to send the person with whom you expect to make a trade advance information on the points you have in mind. [Applause.] That is just the common-sense viewpoint.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman's answer is as explicit and as plain as was made by any person advocating the passage of this bill before the committee. In other words, will not the gentleman admit that he is not willing to confide to the American people in what lines the importations will be increased under the proposed bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not think the information is at present available; and, as I said a moment ago, even if it were available, it would be the height of folly and entirely out of keeping with the sound Yankee trading principles of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to give out his thunder and trading material before he meets the other man in the trade and finds out what he may have.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I suggest to the gentleman that the distinguished Assistant Secretary of State in advocating the measure unconsciously admitted one day that foreign countries had approached the State Department with certain suggestions. What is the gentleman's idea? If those suggestions are in the hands of the State Department, why should they not be in the hands of the Congress?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sure the distinguished gentleman, upon reflection, will realize that question hardly does him credit.

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say to the gentleman that I have reflected on it so long that I am thoroughly convinced of the merit of the question and the undesirability from the standpoint of the Democrats of answering the question.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, I am sure the gentleman will readily appreciate that, even if the State Department has been approached, as the Assistant Secretary stated, and I have no doubt they have, they cannot come here and state the whole proposal and put out all the details and information in reference to the negotiations that they expect to enter into through diplomatic relations. The question hardly does the author the credit to which I think he is entitled.

The distinguished gentleman from New York made reference during the course of his remarks—and I have never seen the gentleman labor harder on any subject than he did on the speech he made here today—to one item he claimed he had gleaned from the hearings held on this bill. This was with reference to toys. He made some remark as to the proposition that this country might export quantities of lard and hog products, as well as agricultural products, to Germany in exchange for toys. I just took occasion hurriedly to look up the situation with reference to the importation of toys, which seemed to alarm him so much in connection with this bill. The latest figures I was able to secure for the year 1931 showed domestic production of toys in 1931 to be $68,307,000. The imports in 1933 of dolls, toys, and parts amounted to $2,225,000, or 3 percent. This 3-percent importation of that commodity is disturbing and scaring the gentleman to death. Similar figures might be cited as to many other points that seem to be disturbing some of the gentlemen on the minority side who are opposed to this measure.

As was shown during the hearings on this bill, there are 29 separate countries each of which is the principal source of supply of commodities to the United States. These countries also furnish a market for 85 percent of our exports. With this kind of a situation existing so far as concerns 29 countries of the world, the principal sources of supply for leading commodities that this country imports, and at the same time furnishing a market for 85 percent of our exports, certainly it is within the range of possibility that we may sit down at a table with representatives of countries of that kind and be able to do some business that would be very definitely in the interests of agriculture and the business of this country. According to the figures given by the Secretary of Agriculture when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, we are exporting some 55 or 60 percent of our cotton, some 20 percent of our wheat, and some 40 percent of our tobacco, as I recall the figures now, about half of our packing-house lard and exporting considerable quantities of many other agricultural products. With these ever-shrinking foreign markets, what is going to become of the agriculture of this country? What is going to become of affairs in this country when the purchasing power of agriculture shrinks even further? It is of the highest importance that we negotiate these trade agreements with other countries of the world to the end that we may sit down at the table with them and in a spirit of friendliness which should prevail between the nations of the world as it should between individuals, say to them: "Now, here, we have certain products in this country of ours that you need. You have to import them. You have to get them from somewhere in the world outside of your own country. You have certain things that we need and can use. Let us see if we cannot do some business on a simple, common-sense, American business basis." If we can, all very well and good. The President may enter into such trade agreements. If he cannot do it to the advantage of the American people he simply does not have to make the trade. He does not have to enter into the agreement.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention especially to what impresses me as the principal objection raised to this bill by our distinguished colleagues on the left. This has been very properly termed a fear of what might happen. In this connection I simply invite attention to the expression of the President of the United States himself. We may theorize and generalize all we please, we may build up straw men to knock down. We may try to find something to scare ourselves, we may manufacture all kinds of objections and think up all types of things that might happen, but after all, as I pointed out a few moments ago, the very specific and definite language of this bill itself provides that the authority shall be vested in the President of the United States. It imposes upon him the responsibility and the duty of finding that these conditions exist before he can exercise the authority that is conferred under the provisions of this measure. I invite attention to the expression of the President in transmitting this subject-matter to Congress for consideration in his message of March 2, 1934. The pending bill is the result of this message. On page 2 of the message there is the following:

The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed. The adjustment of our foreign-trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests. In a time of difficulty and unemployment such as this, the highest consideration of the position of the different branches of American production is required.

That is the expression of the President himself in his message on this subject.

As was indicated by the question of the distinguished gentleman from New York, I have no doubt that our great President will exercise this discretion in the interest of all the people of this country. I do not think there is anything to cause alarm in the record of that great patriot and statesman, that man who is giving his very life in the service of the people of this country and the service of the whole people of the Nation, whose confidence he enjoys to a greater extent than any other man, I think, in the history of the Nation, the greatest leader the Nation has seen for a half century or more. Certainly there is no American interest that has any reason to fear or feel disturbed about the exercise of discretion by that type of patriot and statesman who is in charge of the affairs of this great Government of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen: For the past few days the House has had the privilege of listening to a very able discussion of the measure before us.

Members on the Democratic side have presented their theory with great candor and ability. On the Republican side our membership has rallied to the defense of the traditions of our party with great ability. I dare say few speeches have ever been made in this Congress that will surpass the speech made this afternoon by our distinguished floor leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

This is a very important measure. I think we are at the parting of the ways with reference to party policy concerning the tariff. We are about to make an important decision here. If the Democrats pass this bill, which no doubt they will, they will find themselves diametrically opposed to the traditions of their party. They are, apparently, bound to follow their leader, the President, without regard to where he leads them. I have no desire to detract from his work in any way, but I want to say to you that, today, the Democratic Party is marching directly opposite to the position taken by Thomas Jefferson and its great leaders from Jefferson down to this day, especially the leaders for the past 75 years. I know that in their hearts a great many of the good Democrats agree with me in this respect.

I have the honor of following on the floor here today my good friend from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, a fine, upstanding, young man; and if he stays in this Congress as long as his predecessor, Finis Garrett, his record will, no doubt, shine with that distinguished Tennessean and with the other Tennessean [Mr. BYRNS], who is now the floor leader of the Democrats.

However, my distinguished friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] gives his case away completely this afternoon. He states here that the President will sit down at a table and will discuss with the envoys of Japan and make his decision then. This is the whole crux of this bill. When the President makes this decision he will be levying a duty, he will be levying a tax, which, according to the Constitution, is absolutely within the province of the Congress and is not in any way within the province of the President. So I say to you that he refutes his own position entirely, as well as the position taken by the Democratic Party throughout the ages.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that the President of the United States will not do anything wrong. It is a great compliment to our theory of government, the greatest compliment anyone can pay us, that not from the days of George Washington down to today has any President ever sold out the country. None of our Presidents, Democratic or Republican, has ever been guilty wilfully of doing anything that he felt would react against his country, but a number of them have done things that were not for the best interests of the country. I am perfectly willing to admit that probably many Republican Presidents have done things that were not for the best interests of the country, and likewise I would have to assert that many Democrats have done things that were not for the best interests of the country. They were all honest, but they were not all right all the time. It is in that spirit I voice my opposition to this bill.

The burden of the song of every Democrat who has spoken on this measure has been that we need this legislation to encourage our imports. Let me give you a few figures that will completely answer this statement.

Every month since June of 1933, without exception, has shown an increase in our imports and exports over the like periods of the preceding year. If our imports and exports are increasing every month, why should we tamper with them by invoking a proposition we know nothing about? Why should we deviate from the time-honored policies of both parties, to keep within the province of the Congress the duties that the Constitution gives it? The following table will show the movements of imports and exports into and from America for the period since June 1933:

Unlike most tariff bills this bill is a short one. Reducing it to simple language and omitting nonessentials it could be expressed about as follows:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States, by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States, the President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting foreign trade, is authorized:

First. To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments, and Second. To proclaim such modification of existing duties as are required to carry out any such foreign agreement. But he cannot increase or decrease by more than 50 percent any existing rate, or transfer any article from the dutiable to the free list. Cuba is to be given preference on her exports. The President is given the right to suspend modifications of duties made by him to countries which accord discriminatory treatment to American commerce. The President may at any time terminate such modifications.

Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

By this bill Congress gives the President authority to enter into secret contracts with foreign nations with relation to tariffs. When the Constitution gives Congress certain powers it at the same time enjoins upon Congress the duty of assuming these powers. A surrender of these duties by Congress is a dereliction of its duty. The Constitution gives the President certain powers. When he assumes the powers given to another branch of the Government even though surrendered to him by such other branch because of its weakness, he is assuming powers not intended for him and the assumption of the same by him tends to weaken the Government. Our Government is strongest when each of the three divisions are capable of functioning completely and without surrender.

By this bill no time limit is provided for its termination. The language is ambiguous and uncertain. The last paragraph seeks to define a time for limitation, but to my mind this bill gives the President the right to use his discretion without much limitation either as to time or substance. By removing the required formula "difference in cost of production", the bill practically nullifies the whole law, for 50-percent limitation will then be uncertain.

In the advocacy of this measure we see a complete reversal of position by the leaders of the majority party from that expressed by them when the 1930 Tariff Act was under consideration in the House. At that time the flexible-tariff provision was adopted. Its constitutionality was assailed by the Democrats most vigorously. In that bill Congress designated specifically what could and could not be done, and the Executive was given specific authority. He was not given unlimited discretion. That bill provided that the President could alter the rates fixed by Congress when and if the Tariff Commission, after investigation as to the cost of production here and abroad, recommended certain changes in the rate. Under that bill the President had no power to do anything of his own volition. The powers given him were powers to do certain things when and if a fact-finding agency would find certain facts for him. If the Democrats strained at this surrender of power by the legislative branch to the President, it is difficult to reconcile their conduct then with their conduct now, when they rush to support and pass a bill giving the President unlimited power to bargain for tariff rates and to do so at his own discretion and secretly and without any accountability to anyone for what he might do.

In that connection, I want to discuss the line of argument of my friend from Tennessee. Ladies and gentlemen, there is one thing that has made American diplomacy distinctive. Our diplomacy differs from that of every other diplomacy in that ours has been open and aboveboard. The diplomacy of foreign countries has been secret, and in that system we have seen chicanery; in that we have seen deceit. If we ever come to the time and place when we must deal secretly, and without taking into our confidence the American people, it will be a colossal mistake. Talk about democracy! Talk about State rights! When this President has served his term out, his new deal will have wrecked the proud traditions of the Democratic Party and they will be walking by the still waters in solemn contemplation. This country is not yet ready for dictatorship and Russian socialism. Rugged individualism is safer than ragged socialism. Whether to be proud, free citizens or servile subjects is the question we must soon decide if we continue this course of surrender of legislative authority to satiate Executive thirst for power. Someone in the course of this debate suggests McKinley, the great protector of American industry, might have favored this legislation, and that this legislation is in line with the McKinley tariff bill. Let no one be deceived by this insinuation. McKinley, the representative of my State on the Ways and Means Committee, which assignment I have now the honor to hold, was great as a Governor of a great State, and great as President of our country, but his greatest service to America is seen in his efforts to enact legislation that brought the country out from under the Grover Cleveland depression. The McKinley tariff bill carried no dictatorial powers to the President.

No! McKinley's greatest accomplishment was not in his having been President. When the impartial historian writes the story of Major McKinley and his contributions to the welfare of his country he will say, although his record as a soldier was one of which any soldier might well be proud, and although his record as a Governor of a great State was an illustrious one, and although his record as a peace-time and a war-time President was equal to the best, still his work as the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in connection with tariff measures that bear his name was his greatest contribution to the welfare and growth of his country, for it contributed mightily toward making the United States the greatest nation in the world. [Applause.]

In determining whether one should support the measure, he can ask himself two questions?

First, Is it constitutional?

Second, Is it right as a policy?

A negative answer to either of these queries will be sufficient to call for a rejection of the bill. To favor this bill one must answer affirmatively both of these queries.

Is the bill constitutional? Does it provide for a surrender by Congress of its power "to lay and collect duties and imports" and "to regulate commerce with foreign nations", as provided in section 8 of article I of the Constitution?

As with probably every provision of the Constitution, courts through judicial decisions have run out every possible implication, so the courts have been called upon frequently to interpret the language above referred to. There is no question but that Congress can designate an agency to carry into execution its enactments. It can lay down the rule by which something is to be done, and this rule is thereby a part of the law. When such agencies perform according to that rule they are not enacting legislation but are executing legislation. The Congress is in effect authorizing and instructing such agency to perform in a certain way. But if such agency attempted to use its own discretion in making or changing such rule it would be exceeding its authority, and even if Congress would attempt to give such agency the authority to change such rule its efforts would be null and void, for before such agency can have a right to legislate it must get it from a higher source than Congress. It must receive it from the Constitution, which is the same source from which Congress received its authority to legislate.

Before the President can legislate he must get the authority from some source. As yet the Constitution has not given him that authority, "the right to lay duties" and "to regulate commerce with foreign nations" is exclusively the power of Congress. Congress has no right to pass this authority on to someone else. If the makers of the Constitution wished that to be done, it is safe to assume that they would have said so.

Witnesses in behalf of the administration—for this is the administration's bill—at the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee set out in great detail their views as to the constitutionality of this bill, but through it all they have failed to draw the distinction between provisions granting the Executive the power to find facts, then apply them according to a prescribed rule, and provisions giving the Executive the power to enter into secret negotiations without any prescribed rule except the rule of his own arbitrary discretion. This bill seeks to give the Executive power which the Congress cannot give away and which the Executive has no right to receive. Of all State court decisions dealing with this subject probably the decision of Judge Ranney, of Ohio, is the most quoted. Judge Ranney is by many considered the John Marshall of the Ohio Supreme Court. In the case of Railroad v. Commissioners (1 Ohio Stat. 88) he says:

The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.

Probably the most decisive Federal decision on this subject is that found in Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649). The court in that case says:

That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular case under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them, that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed, that is, which he found to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words "he may deem" in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

At this point I want to take up the cases cited a few minutes ago by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. I was very much pleased, and listened with a degree of interest to the gentleman from Texas, and I was interested in the strategy of the distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in thrusting Mr. SUMNERS in at, perhaps, the most strategic position in the debate. Why did he do that? Because he knows the high standing the gentleman from Texas enjoys with the Membership on both sides of the aisle, not only in scholarship but as a real gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS gave you the development of this question as it took its course through devious legislative enactments and through intricate court decisions.

I make this positive statement—and I think I have read all the leading decisions on this proposition—that in no decision anywhere has any court ever stated that the Congress of the United States has any right to delegate its power of legislation to any President or anyone else, and that the President of the United States has no right to fix tariff duties.

That runs through every decision from the first case under Washington. In that case the President was given no power to levy a tax or to levy a duty.

His powers were strictly powers of administration, and this is the case on down to the great case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649) cited by the distinguished gentleman from Texas. Let me read to you what that decision is. Just as Mr. SUMNERS said, it is difficult to discuss these dry questions, because they involve intricate propositions of law, but here is some language in this decision that I think anybody can understand. He need not be a lawyer or a Congressman, because it is written out clearly. I quote:

Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

The gentleman will note that it provides specifically in that case that nothing was left to the President to do except to follow the law laid down by Congress. Again I quote:

The words "he may deem" in the third section implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing sugar, and when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions reciprocally unequal and uneven were imposed on the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country exporting sugar, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring suspension as to that country.

His duty is laid down specifically as to what he must do when somebody else has made certain findings.

He had no discretion in the premises except with respect to the duration and suspension so ordered.

That is one thing that I should like to impress upon you. The President had no discretion with respect to anything except the time limit. That related only to the enforcement of a policy established by Congress.

Again I quote:

As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to legislative will, he exercised the functions of making laws.

There is no case—and I defy anybody to produce a decision from any court—upholding the constitutionality of any law that gives to the President the right to levy a tax. If he is given the right to levy a tax in this bill, what is he going to do about it? When he sits around the table with Japan, as my friend from Tennessee says, what is he going to do if he is not going to agree on a tax? And I say to you that that is the very thing that he has no right to do.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will yield there, I shall be glad to yield him more time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Certainly, I am glad to yield so that the House may receive an important message from the Senate. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935—MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 14; agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 22, with an amendment; and further insist upon its amendment no. 23 to said bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and for consideration at this time the conference report upon the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto and consider the Senate amendments at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 6663, with Senate amendments thereto and consider the same at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentleman to yield to me for a statement.

Mr. WOODRUM. I should be very glad to give the gentleman some time if this consent is granted.

Mr. CONNERY. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, no. 14, and agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of Senate no. 22 with an amendment as follows:

"In section 27 of said amendment strike out the second proviso.

"In section 28 of said amendment strike out the second proviso in the fourth paragraph of section 20 of Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by such section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That subject to the limitations above prescribed, except as to receipt of compensation on March 19, 1933, and notwithstanding the provisions of Public Act No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, or any other law, veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is established on or after this paragraph as amended takes effect as service connected in accordance with the provisions of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, shall be entitled to receive compensation in accordance with the provisions of such act, as amended, and the rating schedule in effect on March 19, 1933; but veterans whose disease, injury, or disability is reestablished as service connected under such section 200 by section 27 of title III of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, shall be paid 75 percent of the compensation under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended and such rating schedule."

The Senate further insists on its amendment no. 23.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 22, and on that I ask recognition.

Mr. Speaker, I shall take just as little time of the House as possible. The bill has been entirely disposed of, so far as the legislative body is concerned, with the exception of this brief Senate clarifying amendment to amendment numbered 22, which is the veterans' amendment, and the Senate insists on its disagreement to changing a section number, which of course was necessary in order to get that matter disposed of.

In order that the record may be perfectly clear, let me say that I did not vote for the House amendment to the Senate amendment respecting veterans for reasons that I have stated many times and I shall not elaborate upon them now. I merely say this in passing, that I believe this amendment to be contrary to the President's position on veterans' relief.

In the last Congress we gave the President very broad powers respecting veterans' payments. That the so-called "economy bill" was in some respects too drastic, all of us agree, and the President recognizing this fact, has since the economy bill, revised the regulations in more than 50 particulars, reinstating more than $117,000,000 annually of the benefits that were taken away by the act.

The revisions were made as and when it was shown that deserving cases were not being taken care of. The provisions of the present bill as it is about to be adopted is in direct conflict with the program of the President, and as approved by the last Congress. I think the bill should have gone to a free conference. Therefore, I did not vote for the House amendment.

I did not believe it was the best way to ultimately actually get further concessions for deserving veterans. With respect to that, I have not changed my mind, but when the House three times emphatically took its position on this matter, as your representative and as a conferee, I am very glad to be able to come back and say that the Senate has receded on both of these important amendments, and accepted the House provisions.

With respect to the pay-cut amendment, which, as you will recall, is the 5-and-5 proposition, 5 percent February 1 and 5 percent July 1, the Senate accepted that. The Senate very reluctantly accepted the House provision with reference to veterans, making this clarifying amendment, as they are pleased to call it, with respect to the presumptive cases. The language which they have inserted is simply this: You will recall that the so-called "Taber amendment" was the Steiwer-McCarran Senate amendment with merely little interlineations providing that, instead of the presumptive cases receiving complete restoration at 100 percent as provided in the Senate amendment, they should receive 75 percent. That amendment was naturally prepared hurriedly, and after the smoke of battle had cleared away and the legislative experts began to examine it, a question arose as to whether or not it might be possible, under a literal construction, to apply that 75-percent reduction to the direct service-connected cases, as well as the presumptive cases; and in order to avoid any such possible construction, this clarifying language was suggested.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BROWNING. The only thing which the clarifying amendment of the Senate does is to guarantee there will be no reduction to those who had been left on, under the regulations now in force, and the only thing it does is to limit it entirely to the presumptive cases for the 75-percent maximum.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is exactly my understanding of it.

Mr. BROWNING. From the standpoint of the veteran the Senate amendment is very welcome. In fact, it improves the Taber amendment to some extent.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think it does.

Mr. BROWNING. I think it is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. WOODRUM. I hope very much it will be the pleasure of the House to accept this slight modification to our amendment, which will complete the action on this bill as far as the legislative branch of the body is concerned.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Knowing the gentleman as I do, I want to speak for many of my colleagues when I say I know the gentleman is very glad to be able to bring back this generous compromise and give the veterans as much as the bill does carry.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the Speaker of this House for his courtesy to me during the past hectic days of the discussion of veterans and Government employees' pay legislation in recognizing me to make the motions to concur in the Senate amendments; and, second, I wish to thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] for the uniform courtesy he showed in yielding time to those of us who were trying to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments for the veterans and Government employees. Both the Speaker and the gentleman from Virginia have been very fair.

UNDER THE PRESENT PARLIAMENTARY SITUATION

If I could see any advantage to the veterans or Government workers at this time in going along further with the fight to try to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments, I would do so. I want to say that I have no regrets whatsoever for the fight that I carried on to try to obtain concurrence in the Senate amendments. I think the Senate amendments were amendments which would do justice to the underpaid Government employees and to the veterans not only of the World War but of the Spanish-American War. So I have no hesitancy in saying that at no time in the past, nor at the present, nor in the future do I expect to regret my course.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I think the RECORD should show that if it had not been for the fight so gallantly waged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and others who assisted him, the veterans today would not be getting the 75 percent which was set up as the wall beyond which we could not go in effecting this compromise. I think the RECORD should show that.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank my good friend from Minnesota. If the bill becomes a law, the benefits which the veterans will receive will certainly be due to the fight which we put up to concur in the Senate amendments. And the Government workers will get the 5, 5, 5, which they would not have obtained if we had not made that fight.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The veterans, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE], will not get anything unless the President signs this bill, will they?

Mr. CONNERY. No. I hope the President will sign it.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, will he sign it?

Mr. CONNERY. I have no knowledge of what the President will do.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take any further time of the House. With the foregoing statement I have made, of course I expect to vote to concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

And in doing this I wish to say that I thank all the Members who stood with me in that fight for the veterans and the Government employees.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment no. 22.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in amendment no. 23, which merely changes a section number.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 36, line 13, strike out the figure "24" and insert the figure "40".

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia inform the House what effect this amendment has?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is merely a change of section numbers.

Mr. RANKIN. What change was made in Senate amendment 22, if any?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Senate added a clarifying amendment providing that the 75-percent reduction should not apply to direct cases.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur in Senate amendment no. 23.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, a motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

ROLL CALLS NOS. 113 AND 114

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I was unavoidably detained in my State and not able to be present at roll calls nos. 113 and 114. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay."

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed proud and glad to have had the privilege to yield some of my time, and especially my place, on this legislative day for the bringing in of this report by the committee dealing with the veterans' problems. I am glad to add, if I may, to what the chairman of the subcommittee and our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts had to say with reference to the culmination of this great and just task, that the Republican Membership furnished a solid front in support of relief for the veterans and Government workers, and it will be worthy of note that on one vote on this important measure in the House every Republican who voted, voted in favor of the Senate amendments providing for the maximum benefit to veterans and to the Government workers.

Now, to recur to the subject we were discussing, the great tariff question, I want to say that if this bill becomes a law in spite of its unconstitutionality, it might not for that reason alone carry any destructive consequences, for sometimes good is done even in violation of the Constitution. But the enforcement of this bill will, I think, prove very destructive to business for business will still be kept in a state of uncertainty. I can see that if carried out fairly and honestly there might be some good to some persons and industries, but on the whole, the injury that will follow such an imposition upon the individual free initiative of our people will be very disastrous.

This bill provides for the enforcement of a new principle in government. Gradually for years the Executive has invaded functions of the legislative branch of government. Sometimes by surrender of power by weak legislatures or a weak Congress and quite often by the usurpation of legislative power by a selfish Executive. Not since the foundation of the Republic have we seen any President so free and ready to accept and request additional Executive power as the present incumbent. All this is done upon the theory that the country is in a terrible emergency, or that it is in line with the President's program of recovery. We are not in such an emergency as will call for any unusual interpretation of the Constitution, but the enactment of this legislation will tend to add to the confusion of that emergency.

Nobody seriously contends that the President has any program of economy now. With the national debt exceeding that of any time since the establishment of the Republic and still mounting at the rate of twenty millions per day, it is small wonder the President has forgotten his promise of last year to balance the Budget if it took all summer to do it. The cry of "Balance the Budget" is now met with a smile and dismissed as a joke much as is that other famous sentence, "He kept us out of war."

The tariff is a national policy. It is more; it is a part of the business structure of the Nation. It is the policy that represents the difference between being an agricultural province and being the greatest Nation that the world ever knew. Had we not followed this policy almost from the beginning we would yet be an agricultural nation raising food for the other nations of the world. If this policy is directly responsible for our growth, financial and material, it should not be cast aside now in our days of depression. Tried and true doctrines should not be rejected for untried theories of a few communistic intellectuals. It should not be endangered by having it placed in the hands of one individual whose party has openly opposed it for generations, although the individual members of which party have always been ready to accept its benefits in their local districts. When the tariff needs to be changed, it should be changed by its friends and not by its enemies.

I once heard Uncle Joe Cannon say that he would sooner turn his children over to a stepmother than to turn the country over to the Democrats. I am much in the same attitude when I contemplate the Democrats attempting to change the tariff laws. Every attempt at tariff legislation by the Democratic Party has proven disastrous to the Nation. We should not be lulled into discarding a well-tryed policy by pleas that we should assist the President in his recovery program, or that we are confronted with an emergency. The real reason for the desire of the President to pass this bill is that he believes that to bring into this country more imports will tend to increase our exports, which he thinks will be to our advantage. I hope that the President and his Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, are sincere in their beliefs. Secretary Hull has been an ardent opponent of the tariff through his long and distinguished career. He opposed every Republican tariff measure presented during his long service in the House and in the Senate. Should the President be guided by Secretary Hull in his negotiations for tariff agreements, it may be expected that all agreements that he might make will be in line with the philosophy of Secretary Hull. Indeed it is not unreasonable to suppose that since it will be physically impossible for the President to make these secret agreements, these agreements will be made largely through the office of the Secretary of State. If they are, you may expect an old-fashioned Grover Cleveland tariff.

How Secretary Hull can justify his championship of this bill, giving such unlimited and unconstitutional power to the President to outdo the flexible provision of the present tariff law, in the light of his vigorous former opposition to the flexible tariff, is difficult to understand. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under consideration Secretary Hull claimed that it was unconstitutional and that it constituted an "unjust arrogance of power and authority to the President", and that the power granted to the President was a "vast and uncontrolled power", larger than that of an aristocratic king. This bill far exceeds the flexible-tariff provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act. Will Secretary Hull follow this bill into its far outreaches or will he hark back to his lifelong tendencies toward free trade? Wait and see. Either course is dangerous.

The reasons Secretary Wallace has for supporting this measure are in line with the philosophy that controls the actions of his Department. This is the philosophy of Tugwell and Mordacai Ezekiel and of Frank and Frankfurter and all the other radicals who are leading us straight to Russian sovietism. They want a dictator. They favor regulation of agriculture. They demand cooperation through compulsion. They believe that we should buy where we can buy the cheapest. Their main idea is to destroy surplus. Their theories will Russianize America. Some of them affiliate with the Civil Liberties Union, which believes that the red flag of communism should fly above the American flag. They are internationalists. Secretary Wallace, in his pamphlet America Must Choose, says:

Revision of our tariff downward will have far better prospects if our new deal succeeds than if it fails.

Further in the same pamphlet he says:

A truly practical readjustment of our own tariff policy would involve the careful examination of every product produced in the United States or imported, and the determination of just which of our monopolistic or inefficient industries we are willing to expose to real foreign competition. This problem should be approached from the point of view of a long-time national plan which we are willing to follow for at least 20 or 30 years, even if some of our friends get hurt, and howl continuously to high heaven.

This is an augury of what to expect from Mr. Wallace if he has any part in making up the President's mind as to whether to reduce tariff rates, and there is no doubt but that he, Secretary Hull, and Secretary Roper will be the President's advisers.

If this bill becomes a law the President, who now has the power to control every business in the land, will have the power to say whose business shall be permitted to continue and whose business, according to Mr. Wallace, "will have to be retired." Can we then sing, "Long may our land be bright with freedom's holy light"? More appropriately shall we sing the song of the Soviet. My colleagues, this philosophy, if adopted, marks the beginning of the decadence of the greatest Nation that the world ever knew. Shall we break upon the shoals of communism because a lot of Communists are now holding high places in our Government? Shall we disintegrate by scattering our substance to the other nations of the world under the philosophy of internationalism? Shall we further encourage dictatorship? I say no! I should rather die with rugged individualism than to live with ragged communism. I should rather the free American citizen pass on into history as a contribution to civilization than to see him transferred into a servile subject. My friends, the question is, Shall we be free citizens or servile subjects? Mr. Wallace says America must choose. I have already chosen.

For a long time I have had no patience with the clamor that our success lies in friendly international agreements. We already have friendly international agreements that show a balance in favor of our Government of about fifteen thousand millions that we will never collect and of about twenty thousand millions that our American citizens will never collect. When these countries develop a conscience that tells them that common honesty is yet a virtue it will be plenty of time for us to make secret trade agreements with them.

For a long time I have felt that since we do one half of the business of the world with ourselves we are not so bad off. If 3 years ago our President had refused to grant a moratorium to European nations and had recommended that they themselves call a moratorium on national chicanery and dishonesty, the world would be in better shape today. We have been made puppets of by European diplomats. Europe today has recovered from the depression much faster and further than we have. As proof of this, let me read a letter that I received yesterday from a constituent of mine who is a manufacturer and business man of rare acumen:

Your circular letter of March 7, regarding the bill which Mr. Roosevelt has ordered to be introduced in Congress, giving him dictatorial powers with reference to the control of tariff rates, etc. Answer to your letter has been delayed owing to the fact that I have been absent.

I have just returned from a couple of months in England and France, where I called upon a number of firms in the same business that we are in. Strange to say, all of them were very busy, and one of the general managers volunteered the information that his firm had just finished the best year in its history.

It was interesting to me to note that apparently both of these countries are recovering industrially without the benefit of the N.R.A., limitless spending of money on public works, and numerous other panaceas in which the present administration places so much faith. The tariff is of only indirect interest to us. We do not export to any great extent and do not use any imported materials. However, we realize that the tariff is of immense importance to American industry, and we would hesitate to see Congress abdicate any more of its power.

Our duty and our opportunity is here at home. Let us quit our interference with and entrance into the business affairs of all our people and allow them once more to draw a free breath. Give the American citizen a free chance and he will demonstrate that his genius for accomplishment is superior to dictatorial edicts. If we need to make these trade agreements, why not make them through the Tariff Commission, for they will have to be made by someone for the President? Why have them made through doubtful friends of our country and in secret? Publicity is the greatest guaranty to honesty and the greatest antidote to crookedness.

In 1929 our total volume of business was $100,000,000,000. Those were the days when business was normal in all directions. At that time ninety billions of this business was done among ourselves—Americans on both ends of the deal. Ten billions was done with foreign countries, six billions in exports, and four billions in imports, 67 percent of which came in duty free—a balance of two billions in our favor. Why hamper the ninety billions just for a chance to make a small percentage of two billions. We have no fear of losing all our foreign trade. Foreigners will always want to deal in the world's largest market. There are no manufactured articles that we cannot make in America. Coffee, tea, silk, and rubber are our most necessary imports. Coffee will always be purchasable from Puerto Rico and Central and South America. Tea, silk, and rubber will always be for sale if we have the money. America can be practically self-contained.

Let us devote ourselves to a program of building up our own business. European countries are already dedicated to such a course, which accounts for our loss of foreign trade. I am not in favor of a plan of isolation. Neither do I fail to appreciate the importance of imports and exports. Still I am not in favor of scrapping the Constitution or scattering our domestic business in order to win trade from those who owe us, unless they are willing to credit it on account of the debts they owe us. We will never regain this trade. Why waste our energies in trying to regain it? Samuel Crowther, one of the Nation's greatest economists, has written a wonderful book on this and kindred subjects. I think he must have written his book before giving it a title. It is a story of the greatness and sufficiency of our great country. The title of his book is "America—Self Contained." This distinguished economist student and patriot yet thinks that American freedom and initiative should not be supplanted by enforced cooperation, regimented labor, controlled production under threat of penitentiary punishment. In his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means he says—

I have objection to this bill because it conveys broad discretionary powers upon the President without initiating a policy within which that power is to be exercised—without initiating a national policy and without any capacity for review.

With reference to the importance of a revival of our foreign trade he says—

I think we are wasting our energy. It is dead beyond the point of revival.

It has been suggested that the foreign debts are involved in this bill. It is stoutly denied by the Secretary of State and others, but Samuel Crowther maintains that it is impossible to separate them, and he says with reference to them, "This bill recognizes the worthlessness", meaning the worthlessness of the debt. In his book, America—Self Contained, Mr. Crowther says:

The great majority of the industrialists of the country are agreed that their possible foreign business is of slight consequence as compared with the future of the home market.

If the President is not expecting to carry out the plan of Secretary Wallace to eliminate the inefficient industries, there is absolutely no reason for the passage of this bill. If he is expecting to carry it out, then the bill should be passed. If he is to act upon the facts found for him by a governmental agency, he already has the most efficient agency at his command—the Tariff Commission. I may be too much exercised about this—I admit that I am much exercised—for I fear a surrender of this power by Congress to the Executive marks a long step in the wrong direction. To give any one man the right to annihilate one industry and to advance another is going too far. If the President is to annihilate the inefficient, how is he to determine which to annihilate? However much fault some people find with our legislative system, it is nearer to the people than any other branch of our Government. What will happen under this bill? The sugar producers will be the first to feel the iron heel of dictatorship, for Secretary Wallace has already put the sign of destruction on it. I am wondering if it will reach the pottery industry of the great State of Ohio. The greatest pottery-manufacturing section in the United States, if not in the world, centers in Ohio. In fact, many great industrial, financial, agricultural, commercial, and moral organizations and movements center in that great empire known as "Ohio." The following figures show the production of pottery in the past few years: 1929, 30,000,000 dozen, valued at $33,500,000; 1930, 25,000,000 dozen, valued at $27,500,000; 1931, 20,000,000 dozen, valued at $23,300,000; 1932, 17,000,000 dozen, valued at $16,300,000; 1933, 19,194,948 dozen.

This industry employs about 20,000 men in normal times. Mr. Dowsing, testifying before the committee, testified that he represented the Pottery Manufacturers Association and that they opposed this bill, maintaining that it carried very many dangerous possibilities to the pottery business. The pottery business in the United States is a perfect illustration of a domestic business. No pottery made in the United States is exported. It is impossible for American manufacturers to compete with the cheap foreign labor. The American product is equal to the product of any country in quality. If the tariff is reduced on pottery, the American pottery industry will be ruined. At the present time the pottery industry requires a 75-percent to 85-percent duty protection in order to compete with foreign manufacturers. The pottery industry is not asking for an embargo against pottery from England, France, Germany, and other European countries, but it is asking for a duty that equals the difference in cost of production. But if a duty were placed high enough to keep out Japanese goods, it would amount to an embargo against European pottery, for Japan with its cheap labor can make cups and saucers for 10 or 12 cents per dozen which would cost three or four times that much here. The only way to control Japanese importations of pottery is by a quota. Now, if those industries that cannot compete with Japanese cheap labor are to be considered as inefficient and are marked for annihilation, then the pottery industry in the United States had as well give up the ghost. This is a most appropriate illustration of what may happen. Suppose Secretary Wallace and his communistic cohorts and Secretary Hull and his free-trade cohorts can see where it would be greatly to the advantage of the cotton producers of the South to trade their cotton for Japanese silk and pottery, and for the farmers to trade their lard and meats and grains to Japan for cheap tile, brick, and pottery, what is to prevent them from doing so? If they mean to carry out this plan, the pottery and clay-products business offers as good an opportunity as any other. Of course my people in Ohio would raise a tremendous objection; but, as we are a great Republican State and as this is a great protected industry, we are in poor position to demand that we escape the executioner's ax. I hope it will not fall on this industry but it may do so, and that is one good and sufficient reason why I am against it. I cite this illustration the better to show the people of my State what dangerous possibilities this bill contains.

I may be too much exercised about this. I admit I am much exercised. How is he to do it, this President or any future President who is called upon to select the inefficient? It is a very difficult task to perform.

However much fault some people find with our legislative system, it is nearer to the people than any other branch of our Government.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would rather not yield until I have completed the main part of my speech.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I wish to ask a question right in this connection.

The representative of the pottery industry said he asked for an embargo.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; I beg to differ with the gentleman from Washington in that respect. I read his testimony very carefully. He said he did not ask for an embargo against European countries, but if they were to deal with Japan they must have an embargo. Why? He said because in Japan they make these articles so cheaply it would take at least a 300-percent tariff to meet Japanese competition.

Were our President to sit in at a reciprocal trade conference with Japan, what would Japan ask to trade? Pottery. And should the President make such a deal with Japan, then it is good-bye to the pottery industry of my State, which does an annual business of over $33,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, it is a serious proposition to the pottery industry of my State; and to the gentleman from West Virginia, who is listening so attentively, I will say it is a serious proposition to West Virginia. It is a great industry, but it has been put on the trading block, and nobody in it has any heart to proceed; nobody has any heart to expand his business, because it is on the trading block; it is going to be talked about when the Japanese envoys get around the table with the President of the United States, as the gentleman from Tennessee says; and if they say it is an inefficient industry, such as Secretary Wallace talks about, then it is good-bye to the pottery industry of Ohio.

You can go down to the 10-cent store now, if you want, and buy pottery made in Japan by cheap labor for 10 cents a dozen. You can buy them much cheaper than we can make them here. No manufacturer in the United States can compete with Japan on cheap pottery. What applies to the pottery business may just as well apply to any other industry that is protected by a tariff.

Now, I must proceed. I have many other reasons I could assign why I am opposed to this bill.

To summarize my opposition to this bill:

First. The passage of this bill is not necessary, for the benefits that might accrue under it can be secured under the present tariff organization.

Second. It is unconstitutional.

Third. The amount of imports in normal times is only about 3 or 4 percent of the goods consumed in the United States, and 67 percent of those are on the free list.

Fourth. We do one half of the business of the world in the United States, and all nations are glad to deal with us and send their surplus to the greatest market in the world.

Fifth. Our concern should be greater for the ninety or ninety-five billions in business done among ourselves than the five or ten billions done with all the rest of the world.

Sixth. No further grant of power should be given to the President. Republics are ruled by the people and not by dictators.

Seventh. Protective tariff is largely responsible for the growth of the Nation. It is a Republican policy. It has been opposed by the Democrats. It should not be changed by its enemies.

Eighth. Increase of imports does not relieve unemployment in our country.

Ninth. It is un-American for any one man to have the authority to say that any certain industry must be annihilated and that certain other industries should be encouraged and expanded. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, H.R. 8430 has for its object the granting of authority to the President to make foreign-trade agreements by increasing or decreasing, not to exceed more than 50 percent, existing tariff rates for the purpose of expanding our foreign markets and establishing and maintaining a better relationship with foreign nations, for the benefit of agriculture, industry, and commerce.

During the entire history of our Nation there has always been a great diversity of opinion among the followers of the Democratic and Republican Parties as to the best procedure affecting imports or tariffs. I have heard it contended that the Democratic Party was never for a tariff and that we were "free-traders." As a matter of fact, in the early history of our Government, and for the first 50 years of its existence, at a time when democracy was ruling this Nation, building the cornerstones and laying the foundations upon which our great structure was builded, our party stood for a tariff. It threw its arms of protection around the infant industries in order that they might develop and not be crushed by foreign wealthy powers. This continued until this child grew to full manhood and became rich and omnipotent. At this time it was discovered that the protected industries were coming to the Congress demanding and receiving a protection for their own personal gain, and that it was necessary to protect the public as against these selfish interests. It was then that the Republican Party took up their battle and gave to industry a greater protection, culminating in the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy tariff law.

When this tariff bill of 1930 was pending President Hoover, in his message, stated that there were a few revisions that should be made, and Speaker Longworth, in his opening address of that session, declared that there were very few changes that should be made. No sooner had the committee started its work than these financiers, rich omnipotent protected industries, began to exert their influence, and, as a result, they enacted the most outrageous high protective tariff ever known in the history of the Nation. During its pendency over 40 of the leading nations of the world protested and begged that the law be not enacted. They held their hands up in holy horror, and at last declared if such a law were passed barring their goods from American markets, that they would pass retaliatory laws. As a result, nations that scarcely knew what it was to collect an import duty not only passed high-tariff laws but established embargoes, prohibitions, and quotas which were prohibitive as against America, a simple example being that the tariff on a Ford car in France is as much as the purchase price in this country. American industries established branches and others established industries in Canada and foreign countries in order to avoid the embargoes and tariffs imposed on American goods.

We are a surplus-producing nation, both in agriculture and in industry, and being barred on the foreign markets and unable to dispose of our surplus, it accumulated here at home, causing a financial panic and a depression never known in the history of our Nation. Farmers were unable to sell their products and could not buy from the local merchants, the local merchants could not buy from the wholesalers, and the wholesalers from the factories. Thus these industries ceased to operate, their men were thrown out of employment, they were unable to meet their obligations, like the farmers; bank failures and bankruptcy appeared on every hand and the poor and laboring class of people numbered 13,000,000 of unemployed, resulting, for the first time, in this Nation being required to feed and clothe its people at Federal expense. All of which was due to this outrageous Smoot-Hawley robber tariff law, engineered by Grundy, of Pennsylvania, who contended that no one but the manufacturers who had contributed money to the Republican campaign funds should have any voice in the matter.

It is a striking illustration that agriculture and industry should go hand in hand. When the farmer fails to prosper and has no money with which to buy, industry suffers. By reason of these high tariff walls existing in foreign countries in retaliation and as a punishment for the Smoot-Hawley law, we have not attempted to amend that law, because we can accomplish no good by so doing. Unless there are radical changes made by foreign-trade agreements, we will probably never in our lives see another general tariff law enacted. Still there are some of our Republican colleagues today, in a half-hearted way, defending this law, notwithstanding the fact that it has been overwhelmingly repudiated at the hands of the American electorate. They constitute the remnants of the old Hoover regime which would not give a dime to feed or clothe the poor of the Nation, which they ridiculed as a dole, but relented to loan money to buy feed for the jackasses. It is interesting to note that Senator Smoot, Senator Grundy, and Representative Hawley were immediately retired to the shades of quiet and peaceful domestic life. One half of the former Republicans of this Nation deserted their party at the last election as a retaliation, due to conditions brought about by this tariff law, which further protected industry and the unjust accumulation of wealth into the hands of a few. Labor never received its portion of protection. The protection went not into labor or the Federal Treasury, but into the swollen pockets of wealth. If labor received this protection and we can live unto ourselves, why the panic and national calamity?

Prior to 1930 we were exporting $5,000,000,000 annually of our surplus, 40 percent being agricultural and 60 percent industrial. Last year our exports were approximately $1,000,000,000. Our imports in 1929 were $368,000,000, while in 1933 they were $96,000,000. We cannot expect to have an export trade without a considerable import trade. It is absolutely imperative that something be done to expand our foreign trade and dispose of our surplus.

This measure represents a Democratic remedy. The Republicans have no remedy, but are still wedded to their golden calf, the high protective tariff. We cannot stand still, we must either go forward or backward. It is impossible for us to operate under our tariff laws under present conditions. It takes about 6 months to have hearings and obtain a ruling, raising, or lowering the tariff under the flexible provision. Practically all the nations of continental Europe, as well as England and many of the Latin American countries, have vested authority in the executive branch of their governments to negotiate duties below those in their tariff schedules in the course of reciprocal negotiations with other countries. In many countries this executive authority goes so far as to make changes over night. This means that we stand no chance for restoration of our lost markets without being able to deal quickly. Certainly the Congress cannot make these negotiations. International commerce conducted on a fair, mutual, and profitable basis, such as contemplated in this bill, is calculated to add materially in the restoration of prosperity and serve as a great civilizer and peacemaker. The question today is what are we going to do to regain our foreign trade? We know we have lost it and we must set up some agency to regain it. All the other nations of the world are making reciprocal commercial agreements between one another. We are doing practically nothing because of a lack of authority. I was startled to hear my Republican colleague [Mr. JENKINS of Ohio], just preceding me, make the same remark he and other Republican committee members have advanced. "It is no use to worry about our foreign markets, as they are gone never to be regained." Is such Republican political propaganda sound or reasonable? The purpose of this bill is to vest authority in the President to set up an agency through the Secretary of State to break down the barriers, go into the open markets and create a demand for our surplus. It may sound good for our Republican colleagues to preach isolation, to contend that we can build a Chinese wall around our Nation and live by ourselves. This is probably true. The Indians used to do so, but if we expect to keep step in the march of time and to prosper in the future, as we have in the past, we cannot live unto ourselves, but must trade and exchange goods with our neighbors.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DARDEN. Would we not sacrifice 60 percent of the cotton trade of the world? Sixty percent of our cotton moves abroad. Unless we are to develop our foreign markets, have we not of necessity got to give that trade up?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly.

FOR WHAT DO WE TRADE?

The minority members in the committee and here on the floor of the House have insisted on wanting to know what specific articles we expect to barter or trade. Seeking, of course, to get someone to specify an article which is grown or manufactured in this country with a view of advancing the further argument that the object of the bill is to destroy American industry. They seek not relief from the condition they brought about but political advantage. The answer is, We expect to deal, swap, and trade, and make reciprocal agreements concerning things which come to this country in exchange for our surpluses, the same as we did before the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. If David Harum were alive and figuring on making a horse swap with the deacon, he would not let everyone know the procedure he would follow nor the tactics he would resort to in making a swap. Neither is it good public policy, nor in keeping with his position, for Secretary of State Hull, who will have this matter in charge, to let the nations of the world know in answering questions before the committee as to what articles he expected to barter and trade. Such a procedure would forewarn the other nations. It is no trouble to conceive of thousands of articles that we could make reciprocal agreements concerning, to be imported and sold in this country, in exchange for our surplus manufactured and agricultural products. Forty-eight nations of the world are busily engaged in entering into these kind of agreements. It is not a matter of retaliation with us, but a matter of self-defense. Under this bill we can develop a stable situation with regard to a foreign market.

With the rapid changes in the tariffs, embargoes, exchange restrictions, and quotas, no business man knows how to plan ahead. He is afraid to ship a cargo to a foreign market without a reciprocal trade agreement with that nation, fearing when his cargo arrives there would be an embargo or such restrictions that he would lose his shipment.

It either means that foreign purchasing power for agricultural surpluses be restored or that we continue with the present emergency and undesirable task of retiring surplus acres and the imposition of processing taxes.

THE DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY

It is contended by many of our Republican colleagues that this bill is unconstitutional for the reason it delegates authority to the President to levy taxes, which authority, under the Constitution, is vested in the Congress. This measure carries no such authority. It simply authorizes the President, probably acting through the Secretary of State, to act as an instrumentality to carry out our tariff law with power to raise or lower tariffs, the same as is now vested in the Tariff Commission. It is not a delegated authority. Under the Smoot-Hawley tariff law the President now has practically the last word in tariff questions to the extent of 50 percent. He names the Tariff Commission, and it is reasonable to conclude that if he wants the tariff raised or lowered 50 percent, as now authorized under the law, that he would be able to carry out his purpose. The contention that leading Democratic statesman contended the Smoot-Hawley law was unconstitutional because it vested authority in the President and the Tariff Commission to raise or lower the tariff does not rise to the dignity of an argument for the unconstitutionality of this measure. This is an emergency measure and no one contemplates or desires that it shall be a permanent law. Since the creation of our Government authority in numerous instances has been vested in our Chief Executive by Congress to enter into various reciprocal trade agreements without reporting and receiving the approval of the Senate.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE

It is natural, if only for political purposes, that our Republican colleagues would be opposed to any measure that we proposed affecting the tariff. But how a Democratic Member can oppose this measure is more than I can comprehend. Their argument must be based wholly and entirely upon a lack of confidence in our President. Of course, he cannot make all of the agreements; but it is fair to conclude that he will know the substance of every agreement he approves. Some of the representatives of the sugar industry are skeptical and fearful that he will ruin their industry. In my opinion, such a fear is wholly unfounded. Personally, I am in favor of a reasonable and fair protection of this industry; but if they are entirely inefficient and living and prospering at the expense of the consuming public, they have no right to complain, nor has any other industry that is wholly inefficient. Certainly its friends will not concede the sugar industry is inefficient. This Government does not levy a tax and pass it on to the consumer to take care of the professional, business, and agricultural interests; and no industry has a right to exact that it should be maintained at the expense of the taxpayers.

I represent the greatest tomato-canning industry in America, situated in the Ozark Mountains. This area cans one third of all the tomatoes consumed in America. It could be driven out of business and into the hands of bankruptcy in 30 days if Italy were permitted to ship unrestricted canned tomatoes into this country. But I have no fear of our great leader crippling this industry. He has demonstrated by his entire program that his main and first object is to restore agriculture. Agriculture need have no fear of trade agreements being entered into that will permit other nations to ship their goods here in competition. In my opinion, instead of injuring the manufacturing industries, it will be of untold value. No one in this House would be in favor of adding an additional burden during these trying and panicky times to striving agriculture, business, and industry.

This is not a jump in the dark; it is a conservative measure, to be executed by the world's greatest statesman. Let us not be doubting Thomases and stand still, groping in the dark; but, rather, let us present a solid phalanx with a firm determination that we will back our President in this worthy undertaking to restore peace and prosperity to this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] as he may desire.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering an amendment to the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill of 1930, which is H.R. 8667. This bill does not go as far as I had hoped it would. I was hopeful that a general tariff bill would be brought in by the Committee on Ways and Means, which would give us a chance to revise and lower many tariff schedules which we believe should be lowered.

A tariff bill should not be written in haste, as we all know, because it requires careful study for each item. What we need is a well-balanced tariff, which will not aid a privileged class to the detriment of the masses.

The tariff bill of 1930 is the highest ever written, and it has had the effect of driving away from us our foreign trade, which we enjoyed for so many years and will enjoy again when this question is settled right. When the Smoot-Hawley bill was passed, it built, as it were, a wall around the United States so high that other nations could not trade with us. Other nations are thinking for themselves just like we are, and have passed retaliatory measures against us, and as a result of the legislation on both sides we have been standing here idle counting our fingers, for we had no money to count, and other nations have been doing the same thing.

This bill seeks to tear down that barrier and give the power to make reciprocal trade agreements with any country we may desire to, by reducing our tariff not exceeding 50 percent and they reducing theirs the same. If we can induce a few of the large nations to enter into this kind of agreement, we shall never again have a surplus of anything. If the world were properly fed and properly clothed, we would have no surplus. The trouble now is we are in need of everything and nothing to buy with. The purchasing power must be restored or our people will continue to suffer.

The manufacturing interests have always been protected with a high tariff, and the man who produces the raw material is forced to sell on a market which is not protected at whatever he can get for it, and then buy what he has to buy on a market that is protected. Almost everything a man uses from the cradle to the grave is protected by a high tariff. A farmer will raise a 4-year-old beef steer, butcher it, take the hide to town, and sell it to one man; he will then go across the street and buy a pair of hame strings, and the tariff put on leather makes them so high it takes practically all he got for the whole beef hide to pay for the two hame strings. The same is true with practically everything we have to buy.

Much has been said about giving too much power to one man as President. I agree with that line of thought, but much depends on who is President. I am sure the present President, Mr. Roosevelt, will not abuse this power in the least but that he will use it to help pull us out of the dilemma we found ourselves in on the 4th of last March. Too much cannot be said in praise of our great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt. He admits that he, as well as anyone else, will make mistakes when trying emergency measures to pull us out of the distressing conditions we had drifted into. It is far better to try and not succeed than to fail to try and let humanity suffer.

The President, addressing the Congress, speaking of the decline in world trade, said:

Measured in terms of the volume of goods in 1933, it has been reduced to approximately 70 percent of its 1929 volume; measured in terms of dollars, it has fallen to 35 percent.

The Secretary of State, in his testimony before the committee March 8, 1934, said:

According to reliable estimates, if world trade had gone forward with the annual ratio of gain existing before the war, the nations during the intervening years would have had some $275,000,000,000 more than they have actually enjoyed. And according to these estimates, if world trade had thus progressed there would be today an annual international commerce of near $50,000,000,000 instead of the pitiable figures of less than $12,000,000,000 for 1933.

International trade has steadily grown less each year since 1929. The reduction of international trade in the amount of $40,000,000,000 means the reduction of world production by $40,000,000,000, and this means a reduction in consumption of a like amount and this means correspondingly lower standards of living.

President Roosevelt in his message to Congress stated:

Other governments are to an ever-increasing extent winning their share of international trade by negotiated, reciprocal trade agreements. If American agricultural and industrial interests are to retain their deserved place in this trade, the American Government must be in a position to bargain for that place with other governments by rapid and decisive negotiation based upon a carefully considered program and to grant with discernment corresponding opportunities in the American market for foreign products supplementary to our own.

If the American Government is not in a position to make fair offers for fair opportunities, its trade will be superseded. If it is not in a position at a given moment rapidly to alter the terms on which it is willing to deal with other countries, it cannot adequately protect its trade against discriminations and against bargains injurious to its interests. Furthermore, a promise to which prompt effect cannot be given is not an inducement which can pass current at par in commercial negotiations.

For this reason, any smaller degree of authority in the hands of the Executive would be ineffective. The executive branches of virtually all other important trading countries already possess some such power.

We must safeguard our export industries. If the United States is to regain prosperity and not sacrifice large and important agricultural and commercial interests which give employment to millions of the workers of the country, it must sell certain of its surplus products abroad. As stated by the President in his message to Congress:

Important branches of our agriculture, such as cotton, tobacco, hog products, rice, cereals, and fruit raising, and those branches of American industry whose mass-production methods have led the world, will find expanded opportunities and productive capacity in foreign markets and will thereby be spared, in part at least, the heartbreaking readjustments that must be necessary if the shrinkage of American foreign commerce remains permanent.

The main purpose of the bill is to build up foreign trade. Section 350 (a) reads as follows:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds that the existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States or that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the use of the powers herein conferred, is authorized from time to time—

(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly, except that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the granting of exclusive preferential treatment to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

(b) As used in this section, the term "duties and other import restrictions" includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions, other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports.

Let us pass this bill; and if the tariff is not corrected, then let us rewrite the tariff bill and make it just and fair to all men. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. There is no dispute as to the desirability of the revival and expansion of international trade in the interest both of agriculture and of industry. There is no doubt a sense in which America can be regarded as the greatest—perhaps the only free-trade nation in the world—since we have absolute freedom of trade between the 48 sovereign States, many of which compare favorably in size and wealth, in diversification of activities, and even in population, with independent nations situated in other parts of the globe. If any nation can stand economic isolation, we can. We consume more than 90 percent of what we produce, and our home markets must be preserved at all cost. Nevertheless, if so confined, the restoration of normal conditions at home would bring a prosperity so far below that which we formerly enjoyed, and which we hope to recover, as to satisfy no one. William McKinley himself, the arch apostle of protection, said more than 30 years ago that "the period of exclusiveness is past." He recognized the necessity of finding foreign markets for our surplus products, and advocated a broad and enlightened policy of commercial expansion. That has been good Republican doctrine from that day to this. And it is equally good Republican doctrine that one method of furthering that end is through reciprocal trade arrangements with other nations, which can and should be accomplished without compromising the principle of protection. The Republican platform in 1900 contained this plank:

We favor the . . . policy of reciprocity so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

It is not contrary to Republican policy even to advocate certain reductions in tariff rates in the interest of trade expansion, where changed conditions of relative cost of production make this possible without involving unfair and ruinous competition. Unfortunately this pathway is pretty effectively barred by the increased cost of production under the codes of the N.R.A. European and Asiatic goods, made with long hours of work, low wages, often sweatshop conditions, are even now leaping over our tariff walls, flooding us with foreign-made goods, and threatening the existence of many of our industries. If it is desirable for American industry to be protected from cutthroat competition at home, it is most assuredly right that it should be protected from cutthroat competition of foreign manufacturers.

It is also recognized by the Members on both sides of the House, excepting only the silver bloc, that the development of international trade is conditioned, in the last analysis, by the exchange of goods and services for goods and services. This is true, subject only to the limitation that the amount received by citizens of other lands for their investments in American securities in excess of the amount received by Americans for investments abroad and the amounts spent by American tourists abroad in excess of the amount spent by foreign tourists in this country must be taken into the reckoning.

Finally, the principle of a flexible tariff, permitting the changing or rates within limits by the President under definite conditions imposed by Congress, is a Republican contribution to tariff policy. But note that the President, under the present tariff law, relying on the results reached by a fact-finding nonpartisan Commission, is merely authorized to carry out the expressed will of Congress by changing rates to meet changed relative costs of production so as to maintain fair and reasonable competition.

This bill proposes something totally different. There are no conditions imposed; there is no fact-finding body involved. The President is not instructed to carry out the will of Congress, but is authorized to follow his own sweet will. He is given absolute power of life and death over our industries. There can be no doubt as to the intention of the administration.

Mr. Wallace, whose bill this is, let the cat out of the bag during the hearings on this measure. Here is one passage among many that might be quoted:

Mr. WALLACE. I think it would be quite possible to increase Germany's purchasing power for our lard. Germany, in the old days, was the leading consumer of American lard. Germany today has a tariff of 16 cents a pound on lard, which is nearly three times the present price of lard in this country. Lard is an important product to your State and to my State. I think we should increase Germany's purchasing power for lard very materially in case we import a normal quantity of German goods.

Mr. KNUTSON. What would we bring in from Germany?

Mr. WALLACE. Germany has a large number of small industries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are they efficient?

Mr. WALLACE. They seem to be more efficient than our own; they are willing to sell at lower prices. The Germans are undoubtedly able to sell toys for less than our people are able to sell toys.

Here is the yardstick that is to be used. Willingness to sell at lower prices is the mark of superior efficiency. If that is a sound doctrine, why should not the cutthroat competitor, working with child labor and under sweatshop conditions, be declared the efficient producer? If this yardstick is used, there is scarcely anything that we make that Japan cannot produce and sell, even after paying transportation and tariff charges, for less than our people can sell similar articles. She can produce more cheaply because she has all our latest machinery and because she pays starvation wages and exacts long hours of toil.

The application of the principle enunciated by Mr. Wallace would threaten nearly all of our industries. They are having a hard battle to keep going as it is. They cannot stand the uncertainty this bill will create. The President is here authorized to act without the check of any impartial nonpartisan fact-finding body, and without granting a hearing to the industries affected. Our industries cannot stand it to have this sword of Damocles hanging, always hanging, over their heads.

If industry is dependent on the prosperity of the farmer, it is at least equally true that the farmer is dependent on the prosperity of industry. How long, how long will it be before we take to heart the simple truth that there can be no real recovery, no enduring reemployment, until industry is given a chance to thrive and prosper?

But there is an even greater menace in the bill under consideration. Congress in the special session granted the President vast powers on the pretext that they were war-time emergency powers, and with the understanding that they were temporary in character and would soon be relinquished. But the lust for power is an appetite that grows by what it feeds on. The President's demands now know no limit. This Congress, abjectly surrendering to his dictatorship, has enormously extended his powers through the $2,000,000,000 currency and credit control bill and the cotton control bill. This bill represents the culminating effort to wrest from Congress its last remaining vestige of power. We have no right to surrender this power. To do so would be a direct violation of our oath to uphold the Constitution. I have excellent authority for this statement. When the bill was under consideration, 5 years ago, which proposed to give the President the right to modify rates, although that power was merely to carry out the expressed purpose of Congress, our Democratic statesmen were up in arms. Here is what one of them said, speaking from the other end of the Capitol:

I should like to read a few of the statements of these gentlemen, statements which have not as yet appeared in this discussion, but, asking unanimous consent to include them in the RECORD, in order to save time, I shall press on.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAINES). The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Listen to this from a distinguished statesman at the other end of the Capitol, October 1, 1929, page 4094:

Senator WAGNER. After the Tariff Commission has made an investigation and recommended a change in duty, who is to enact that recommendation into law? The President takes the position that he alone is competent to act with the necessary dispatch to afford adequate relief. It is my view that if a new duty is to become effective, if a greater tax burden is to be imposed upon the people of the United States, the change must secure both congressional and Presidential approval, as in the case of the enactment of every other law. The issue is not between a flexible and an inflexible tariff; the true line of division is between an Executive tariff and a congressional tariff.

Here is the statement of another eminent Democrat, also made at the other end of the Capitol, October 1, 1929, page 4106:

Senator WALSH of Massachusetts. Gentlemen, you are engaged in an assault upon parliamentary government. No one can foresee where this movement will lead or end. One thing is certain: It risks the beginning of the end of that fundamental principle upon which our institutions were built, our happiness secured, and our prosperity maintained up to the present hour. This proposed change would not even be thought of except it is the fashion of the time to belittle and discredit parliamentary government. But the tragedy of it all is that we ourselves are joining in the movement to undermine parliamentary government, which means to put ourselves in the limbo of rejected things.

And here is a gem from Texas, October 1, 1929, pages 4101 and 4102:

Senator SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States provides that all legislative powers granted by its terms shall be vested in Congress.

Congress cannot relieve itself, therefore, of the legislative function without violating the Constitution, the instrument which every Member of the two Houses of Congress has sworn to support and to defend.

It would be difficult to imagine a more serious question than the one before us.

It is the question of whether we are about to delegate a legislative power to the President of the United States.

What is that power?

The life and death of many industries, the welfare of multitudes of men, women, and children would be made to depend on the will or the mood of one man—perhaps on what he ate for breakfast.

The Constitution makes Congress the sole legislative instrumentality. Not only does it vest the law-making power in Congress, but it goes further and specifically ordains that Congress shall levy duties.

The proposal under debate substitutes the President for Congress in the matter of levying duties within limits alarmingly wide. Tariff taxes touch humanity at every step from infancy to dissolution. The power to tax is the power to destroy.

The proposal confronting us clothes the President with legislative power.

It merges the Capitol into the White House.

It deposits the dead body of a suicide Congress at the feet of Herbert Hoover.

The measure under consideration enables the President to make law—to legislate.

It destroys so far as its operation is concerned one of the most vital features of our system of free government—the separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial functions.

Mr. Chairman, ancient civilization rested upon slave labor. Aristotle, the greatest intellect that ever lived, in defending this institution said that if there had been no slavery there would have been no leisure, and without leisure there could have been no civilization. But, he added, with prophetic vision: "If only the shuttle could weave without the hand to guide it, there would be no necessity for slave labor."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Connecticut 7 additional minutes.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Now the shuttle does weave without the hand to guide it. Science and invention have made such tremendous strides, have given us such complete control over the forces of nature, that now it is possible for the first time in history for all men to live in freedom and with leisure and be able to enjoy and contribute to the blessings of civilization; but, Mr. Chairman, these developments have come with such bewildering rapidity that we are in danger of being overwhelmed by our very victories over nature and nature's forces. Selfishness and greed have not been slow to seize their opportunity; folly has done its share; and chaos has resulted. It is necessary to bring order out of chaos, and this can only be done by finding a better balance between production and consumption, a better distribution, a more even-handed justice; but this itself would be of little value if it were purchased at the price of the loss of our liberty and of that individual independence and initiative which constitute our most precious heritage.

When this administration came into power we had hopes that we were to have a leadership which would find the way out while still preserving our liberties, but as the months have rolled on, huge bureaucracies have been piled on huge bureaucracies, measure after measure has been sent down and ordered passed, measures which show that we are being pushed more and more to the left. It is becoming increasingly evident that the political philosophy underlying these measures is not that of our fathers, not the philosophy of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln. It is an alien political philosophy, sired in Germany and damned in Russia.

If we follow this through to its logical end, we shall find that just at the time when we might all have been free we shall all be in chains, living under a completely regimented system.

The President in a recent speech said that he was sometimes amused and sometimes sad over such suggestions. It would be well if he were to take to heart his own counsel when he said, "We must think things through." It were well if he would take a few days off and think through to the bitter end the implications of some of these measures that have had their origin in brain storms of the visionaries who constitute the kitchen-brains cabinet of this administration. It is high time to call a halt. Here and now is the appointed place and time.

If you continue to follow along the path you are now following, you will find in the end that you have sold our birthright of freedom for a mess of communist pottage, and this period of our history, which started out with a promise so fair, shall be known in history as the era of the great betrayal.

You gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House are on record with respect to your own opinion on these matters. You cannot go back on those opinions. If you were honest then, you must still believe those things to be true.

Mention has been made of coming elections. If you continue to vote simply under orders, turning yourselves into a herd of dumb, unreasoning cattle that understand no language but the crack of the whip, if you are fearful of getting on the Speaker's blacklist and losing administration support in the coming election, you will vote for this measure; but if you use your judgment, you will vote against it, unless you were insincere in what you said a few years ago. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I listened with marked attention to the brilliant speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], in the House on Saturday last, against the pending bill (H.R. 8687) granting tariff powers to the President, and also read his speech in the RECORD.

It is always an education to listen to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I doubt whether any Member of either House is his match in the discussion of constitutional law, embellished with a wealth of parliamentary history, and adorned with a felicity and eloquence of expression which always make it a pleasure to listen to him.

This is not in the nature of a reply. I am only a very humble self-made member of the profession of which he has long been one of the national leaders. I have neither the knowledge of constitutional law nor of history, requisite to a reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Even if I had these qualifications, my viewpoint would not permit me to dispute his claims regarding the great change which has been wrought in government in the United States in the last 50 years, converting it, to quote him, "from a federation of States into a unitary socialistic State." My answer would be in the nature of a confession and avoidance. I would say that these things have been and are because they had to be. I would plead that what has happened to the Constitution was only incidental to what has happened to the economic life of America.

He begins with the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 as a manifest point of departure from the old constitutional distribution of powers between the Federal and State Governments, followed by the creation of the Department of Agriculture in 1888 and the Sherman antitrust law in 1890, and following on down to the present program, which for the time being is virtually submerging the State in the scheme of American Government.

The situation is proof of the axiom that "necessity knows no law." One sentence in the Constitution, the power given Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States", now outweighs the rest of the Constitution. It is difficult to believe that the framers of the Constitution ever anticipated the interpretations which have been placed on the commerce clause. It is quite likely that as the gentleman from Pennsylvania states, this power was intended to prevent intermeddling by the States against each other. For the sake of argument, let us admit the gentleman's whole case down to and including his observations on the recent milk decision by the Supreme Court, in which he states that "the Court proceeded to reconcile the acts of Congress with an extraordinary latitudinarian interpretation of the Constitution", and let us direct a brief inquiry into the proposition whether history and experience hold out any hope that a government of the people might carry on and liberty survive the transformations being wrought in the structure and functions of government.

I find some hope in the reflections aroused in my mind while reading the speech. The gentleman properly referred to England as the "mother of parliaments." The British Parliament was necessarily the model from which the framers of the American Constitution builded, although with substantial modifications. But he could not have referred to England as the mother of constitutions, because England has no written constitution.

At this point my mind recalled the only effort I made while in Congress many years ago, which attracted any considerable mention. It was a speech based upon President Taft's veto of the resolution admitting Arizona to statehood, because of the radical nature of its constitution.

In that speech I pointed out that the British executive had not exercised the veto power in 250 years. I also pointed out that the British courts had no power to hold invalid an act of Parliament. At this time I want to add that the British House of Lords cannot reject an act passed three successive times by the House of Commons. It appears, therefore, that the oldest, most substantial and successful democracy in the world carries on without the distribution or even the existence of governmental powers which have been considered fundamental by a people not inherently different than their forebears, the American people.

One further point of difference between the British and American systems may be noted at this time and that is that the Commons, the latest addition in point of time to the British structure of government, has become the head of the system. The last is first. The House of Commons, elected by the people, through its ministry, governs the British Empire. It rules kings, lords, and courts. It is supreme.

In the American system the counterpart of the House of Commons—that is, the House of Representatives—was intended by the framers of the Constitution to occupy in our scheme of government the position now occupied by the British Commons. The Constitution vested in it the power to control the purse strings, which means the control of government. If the House of Representatives does not now occupy the high station contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, I want to point out that it is not, like the Constitution, the victim of changes wrought by the law-making power. The law creating and empowering Congress stands as originally written, except for amendments adopted by the people on its initiation. But the Congress has suffered, and I now speak of it as one of the three coordinate branches of government embracing both Houses. It has become subordinated to the Executive, far subordinated. It does not enjoy that place in the popular esteem held by another coordinate branch, the Supreme Court. And as between the two bodies of the legislative branch, the popular branch has become the lesser. Therefore, in the American scheme of government, the first is last. The House, it is true, still enjoys the power of initiation in matters of raising revenue, but the right of amendment and the exercise of that right by the other body makes it only a right of initiation. There is no comparison between the powers of the House of Commons and the House of Representatives.

This, however, is not the main question. The main question is the status of the Congress as a whole. A question mark has been placed behind it. The question is whether it is not outmoded and overloaded, whether it is not in the same category with the Constitution and from the same causes.

I read a statement made by Thomas A. Edison some years ago, of which I cannot quote the text, but the substance was that the structure of modern civilization had become so weighty and complex that the human mind was not capable of sustaining it and that the whole structure was in danger of a break-down.

The present bill before the House illustrates the situation. It is a bill transferring tariff powers within defined limits from the Congress to the President. It is pointed out by the Republicans that when the President was granted such powers in the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, only 3 years ago, the powers of the President being conditioned on the findings of the Federal Tariff Commission, that the Democrats unanimously opposed it as a transfer of legislative powers to the Executive. Now, say the Republicans, opposing this bill, the Democrats are proposing to vest this power in the President directly. Both are right. The power vested in the President by the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, through the agency of the Federal Tariff Commission, was, like the original creation of the Commission itself, a recognition of the fact that the Congress, overburdened as it is with multitudes of great new questions, could no longer deal with the vast complexities and intricacies of tariff legislation. Both parties have been borne along on the same stream. These powers had to be handed over to a commission created to exercise them.

It is now recognized that in the rapidly fluxing tariff changes of the world, we cannot even await the slow action of a Commission. Foreign tariffs change overnight.

And what is true of the tariff is true of transportation, of communication, of the banking and monetary systems, of internal revenue, of internal improvements, of the entire recovery program, and of every major national policy. The utmost that the Congress can do, and do intelligently, is to lay down policies and define limits, and it is difficult even to find time to do this.

In the old days the problems of government were few and political, now they are many and are economic and sociological. The former school of statesmanship has passed out. This is the day of the economist and sociologist. I am only able to apprehend this situation, not to meet it. Parliaments and constitutions are in the crucible. Whatever happens to them, humanity, liberty, and progress will survive. Even if this be a revolution, it is only a passing phase. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to feel that the main purpose of this bill is to enter into some reciprocal trade agreements for the advantage of some industry and the disadvantage of some others.

There is no question in my mind but if the administration is authorized to enter into these agreements somebody is going to be hurt. No industry in this country will be materially benefited as a result of the trade agreement, unless there is a corresponding damage to some other industry.

I have been very attentive to the debate, hoping that some gentleman will get up and state upon what commodity the tariff is to be reduced. For some reason or other we have not received much information along that line. It would seem that if the administration believes that it can effectually make trade agreements it must have in mind some particular industry that could be dealt with with material advantage to American industry without harming any other industry.

It seems to me that we should be given that information. I do not feel that we can properly act on this bill without receiving information from the administration as to what commodities it is intended to revise the tariff schedules. In the absence of such information, I for one cannot support this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Gladly.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is a progressive, is he?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not the gentleman realize that all of the progressive element in other countries have supported similar measures to this?

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not heard of any country so progressive that they would give us an advantage on a tariff measure.

Mr. McCORMACK. My question is whether or not the progressives of other countries have not supported similar measures?

Mr. BOILEAU. Some progressives in this country have taken that attitude on this question, but I cannot agree with them.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] made a statement a little while ago to the effect that if we were to lower the tariff rates on tomatoes Italy could come in here and drive his people out of business. He said, however, in the next breath that he is sure in his own mind that our President is not going to permit his tomato industry to be ruined. Somebody will get the ax. It probably will not be the tomato industry, which is confined to some extent to the gentleman's district, but it may be the paper and pulp industry that exists in my district; and, although the gentleman from Arkansas may have some assurance that they are not going to interfere with his industry, I have no such assurance with reference to the industries in my district, and I am not willing to give to any individual—the President of the United States or anyone else—the power to lower tariff rates in such a way as to ruin an industry which means so much to the district in which I live.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The paper and pulp industry is now on the free list.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that fact, but this bill gives the President the right to enter into trade agreements.

Mr. FULLER. They cannot raise the duty there under this law.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. While under the bill the President cannot raise the rates on those articles that come in on the free list under this bill, he is given the privilege of freezing those items on the free list. That is inserted in this bill for a purpose that no reasonable man can understand, because it does not mean a thing in the world except that in trading with foreign countries we cannot trade with the only thing that we have to trade with.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that fact, and also the fact that the power to enter into these trade agreements is not going to redound to the interest of industry here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend has an independent mind, and I respect him. The gentleman ought to realize that the probable field of success of such agreements would be in the freezing of commodities on the free list. That is where the greatest field presents itself for the making of reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. To say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] that this bill gives the President no power to take any article from the free list, he is given the power to freeze something there. We pretend to give him that power, although it is something he cannot use, because it is only by act of Congress that anything can be taken from the free list. It is a lot of "hoey", as we say in Michigan.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think that description would apply generally to all of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In view of the interruptions the gentleman has had, I yield him 3 minutes additional time.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman. In considering this legislation from any angle, it must be evident that if we are to enter into any trade agreements and give an advantage to some particular industry, some other American industry is going to be hurt; and it would seem to me that the only fair thing for the administration and the members of this committee to do is to give this House some information as to what commodities are to have their tariff schedules reduced.

Mr. MILLARD. Say sugar.

Mr. BOILEAU. The suggestion is made with reference to sugar. I have the pleasure of serving on the Committee on Agriculture, and the other day we heard a certain representative from the Agricultural Department come before our committee and say that he believes that we should reduce the tariff on sugar because it is an inefficient industry. I pressed the gentleman for further information as to what he meant by an inefficient industry, and he said in effect that any industry that cannot stand on its own feet, any industry that needs the protection of a tariff, is an inefficient industry. If that is the case I must say that the dairy industry is inefficient, because we need tariff for the protection of the dairy industry, and we need a tariff for the protection of practically every other industry in this country to protect our standard of living. I am not fearful that this legislation will result in reducing tariff protection from butter fat or milk and cream. I do not believe the President for the present would reduce the tariff on those commodities, but I do not want to give anybody the power to do so if he should see fit to do so, especially if he has to take advice from the agricultural experts who claim that any agricultural commodity, such as dairy products, that is in need of tariff protection is an inefficient industry. I do not believe any man should have that power, and I, for one, so long as I am a Member of this House will not give the President or anybody else that power.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am well acquainted with the gentleman from Wisconsin and have great admiration for his ability and his purpose, and without in any sense reflecting upon him I want him at his leisure to insert in the RECORD that statement of the Secretary of Agriculture which said that all industries that had a tariff protection were inefficient.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, for the first time since I have been a Member of this House I shall take advantage of the privilege to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I shall insert that quotation.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman recognizes, because of the thoroughness of his study, that our imports in 1933 declined to $1,400,000,000 plus. I know further the gentleman recognizes back in 1929 our imports totaled $4,400,000,000. In other words, in 1929 we had three times as many imports as we had in 1933, and in this connection I want the gentleman to point out any industry in this country, except those which were particularly tariff hogs, holloing because of any deflated Treasury condition or lack of revenues and dividends.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, the gentleman made reference to the reduction in the value of our imports. I wish to say also that the value of American industry materially declined during that same period of time. We should look at the entire picture, if we are to consider the loss in imports.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes, as I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BOILEAU. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Kentucky has called attention to the testimony of Secretary Wallace before the Committee on Agriculture, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] can substantiate what he was quoting.

Mr. BOILEAU. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not say it was Secretary Wallace. I said it was a representative of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is the same thing. He spoke for the Secretary.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, I wanted to have that clear.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention, and also the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the statement appearing on page 57 of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means:

Secretary WALLACE. I can conceive of a situation where Germany, for instance, might be willing to lower the tariff on lard, in case she could move, we will say, some toys into the United States.

Mr. REED. Would you favor lowering the tariff on things Germany produces and ships to this country, and which we produce here in our own country?

Secretary WALLACE. If Germany can produce them more efficiently than we can, it would be of benefit to our customers, as our consumers certainly represent the eventually dominant interest in our population.

Does that not say that Mr. Wallace wants to include importation from Germany of articles that we make in this country?

Mr. BOILEAU. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BOILEAU. No. I do not yield until I have made one statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman does not yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Wisconsin certainly does not need any help from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. I think the gentleman does not need any help from the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not need any help from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman does not yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. In just a moment I will yield. I want to say in reference to this entire tariff question that I perhaps go a little further than most any Member of this House would go. I would not say that I would be in favor of an absolute embargo against any commodity that we can produce in this country, but I will say that so long as there are millions of men unemployed in the United States, so long as we are spending billions of dollars trying to give employment to those men in the United States, so long as we have a condition where men are looking for employment, I, for one, will not permit tariff barriers to be put down to take any of those men out of employment or to permit any foreign labor to come in further competition with American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What I want to keep clear is the statement of the gentleman with reference to what Secretary Wallace said pertaining to tariff industry.

Mr. BOILEAU. I want to keep it straight.

Now, I do not yield further until I make this statement. I did not say Secretary Wallace made that statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Who made the statement?

Mr. BOILEAU. I said that I would put that in the RECORD. It was a representative from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Was it Mr. Weaver?

Mr. BOILEAU. There were three gentlemen who testified. I am not sure of the name at this time. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman knows that Mr. Weaver's statement was repudiated by the Secretary of Agriculture, with reference to his sugar statement.

Mr. BOILEAU. The only thing I can say is that I will put in the quotation if it has not been taken out of the remarks. Sometimes men who give testimony change it completely while revising their remarks.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But I have heard so many misstatements as to what Secretary Wallace has said that I am tired of hearing the statements go unchallenged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman did not hear me say anything about Secretary Wallace.

Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include herein a part of the testimony of Mr. A. J. S. Weaver, Chief of the Sugar and Rice Division of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, given at a hearing before the House Committee on Agriculture on February 19, 1934:

Mr. BOILEAU. Just one further question: As I understand it, there is a limitation as to production of domestic sugar in the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. What is the economic justification for limiting the domestic production of an agricultural commodity produced in this country, when we are already producing less than a third of our domestic consumption?

Mr. WEAVER. There are two, I think.

One is the cost of an expansion of the industry to the consumer. The other is the cost of the expansion of the industry to farmers through a curtailment of their market for other agricultural goods which may be exchanged for sugar in areas outside of continental United States.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand, then, that because it is necessary to protect a domestic product by a tariff you consider it uneconomic, unsound, to produce sugar in this country because we must have a tariff in order to protect domestic production?

Mr. WEAVER. It is expensive to the consumer.

Mr. BOILEAU. It is expensive to the consumer, you say?

Mr. WEAVER. It is expensive to the consumer, and the cost to the consumer is far out of proportion, we think, to the benefits to the producers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, there are other commodities, including agricultural commodities, that we must protect by a tariff, are there not?

Mr. WEAVER. There are many commodities which are protected by the tariff, although, as we all know, most agricultural tariffs are of doubtful benefit to the producers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, yes; but this is one where there certainly is protection to the domestic producer, is there not?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; but the costs are far out of proportion to the benefits. I think the figures in the President's message are approximately correct. That is to say, that virtually, that you are guaranteeing an income, gross income, to producers of continental beets and cane of $60,000,000 and it costs $200,000,000 to the consumers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do you want to say, then, as a general statement, that those agricultural commodities that require a protective tariff are necessarily economically not justified for production in this country?

Mr. WEAVER. Well, I would like to know what commodities you have in mind. There might be some.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, for instance, there is a tariff that is rather high on dairy products. It is necessary to have that tariff in order to protect the domestic dairyman.

Mr. WEAVER. I would rather not comment upon that particular tariff. My impression is, as to most agricultural tariffs, that they are of doubtful benefit to agriculture as a whole.

Mr. BOILEAU. I disagree with that, of course.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are now acting, as far as the tariff is concerned in this country, under a nonpartisan body, the Tariff Commission, which has the power of regulating tariffs on imports to the extent of 50 percent of those articles that already have a duty. As to any other commodities that are coming into this country, we can, by an act of Congress, put a tariff on those commodities if the Members of Congress see fit to do so. Is this not fair; is it not just? Then why change a perfectly good, sound, sensible law.

I am firmly convinced of the fact that the regulation of these tariffs is a wise set-up for the benefit of this country. It gives an opportunity to make such adjustments in the tariff as the American people feel should be made, providing the Tariff Commission and the President of the United States can be convinced that it is the right thing to do.

We have heard discussed from the floor of the House the fact that the tariff is for the benefit of the American manufacturer. We agree to that. We agree that it is not only for the benefit of the American manufacturer, but also for the benefit of American labor. It is of benefit to all people in all walks of life in America. Not only do we benefit American labor but we benefit the American farmer. You Members of Congress should realize that every product grown by our American farmers has a tariff on it. On wheat there is a tariff of 42 cents a bushel, on oats 16½ cents a bushel, on corn 25 cents a bushel, on cotton 7 cents a pound, on wool 34 cents a pound, on whole milk 6½ cents a gallon, on butter 14 cents a pound, and all other farm commodities have a tariff. Who would take them off of farm products?

Statements have gone out from Members of Congress that we do not protect American agriculture. For the life of me I cannot see why any Member of Congress should make such a statement as that. It is certainly far from the facts and the truth.

This bill calls for trade agreements to be executed by the President of the United States. Is it possible that the Senate is going to pass such a bill as this and give up its rights, inherent under the Constitution? Is it possible that we as Members of Congress are going to pass over all rights we have inherited under the Constitution to the President of the United States?

It has been emphatically impressed upon my mind during the past 10 days that one of two things should happen, either that the American Congress—that means the House of Representatives and the Senate—should assert their rights under the Constitution or they should go home. I am just about sick and tired of the things we are doing here in Congress—passing the buck to the President because we are afraid to assume responsibility.

I have the highest regard and respect for the President of the United States, but, Mr. Chairman, when we turn over to him, and he in turn must turn over to various department heads the authority which is delegated to him, because there is no man under the heavens big enough to assume all the obligations and duties we are trying to shirk and pass up to the President just because we are not big enough and will not stand up here and assume those responsibilities—I say it is about time for us either to assume our responsibilities under the Constitution or go home.

Should the Senate turn over to the President of the United States its right to make treaties? Neither Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, McKinley, Cleveland, Wilson, nor Coolidge, were they alive today, would be able to recognize the Constitution of this country; it would be a matter of history to them.

I think that today we are setting up what might well be called the Soviet Union of the States of America under the greatest dictator the world has ever known; and I predict that in less than 2 years, unless Congress assumes its responsibility, just that fate will befall this country and our Constitution will not be recognizable. I say to you Senators: Wake up! I say to you Representatives: Wake up! I say to the American people: Wake up! Or something will befall this country that none of us wants to see.

On last Thursday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the chairman of the committee, made the following statement, as appears from the RECORD:

I am sure the President will not enter into any negotiations or agreements whereby any industry of the United States will be injured.

I say to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and to the Members of the House that during the past 2 weeks the Joint Committee on Printing have been discussing the matter of contracts for paper for the Printing Office for the next 3 months. When we came to the question of newsprint, I asked the chairman why it was that Canadian and foreign newsprint manufacturers were able to quote a much lower price than American manufacturers. The statement was made in reply that operating under the N.R.A. our costs were increased; also, that foreign paper came in free of duty. I asked why it would not be a good thing to place a sufficient duty on newsprint that the American manufacturers might operate under the N.R.A. and pay the wages that the N.R.A. requires the manufacturers to pay. In reply to this one of the Senators made the statement that I raised an improper question at this time.

Mr. W. W. Pickard, who is in charge of the paper industry under the N.R.A., made the statement before our committee that he had taken the matter up with the President in discussing the question whether it would not be a good thing to make some kind of an agreement with Canada whereby they would raise the price of their newsprint paper so that American manufacturers might get some of the business. He made the remark that the President of the United States said, "I hate to see a tree cut"; and that the newsprint industry had better go out of business.

To show you what the newsprint industry means to this country I wrote the Department of Commerce asking for the capital invested in this industry, the number of plants engaged in it, and where they were located, and the number of people employed. Their reply is dated March 22, 1934, and I read it to you:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, March 22, 1934.

HON. ROBERT F. RICH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of March 17, addressed to the Hon. Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, has been referred to this office for reply.

I am informed by the Forest Products Division that a total of 27 newsprint establishments were in operation in June 1933. These mills have an aggregate capital of approximately $200,000,000. In normal times, according to a report by the Association of Newsprint Manufacturers, they gave employment to 9,000 factory workers, but at the time the report was submitted this number had declined to 6,560, while the companies' pay rolls had shrunk to $7,150,000.

Most newsprint mills are located in small towns. In the report mentioned above only three of the mills were reported as located in towns of more than 15,000 population, 11 were located in towns of 5,000 to 15,000, and 13 in towns of less than 5,000. Lockwood's Directory of the Allied Trades, published in 1932, and which probably applied to operating conditions in 1931, or early in 1932, listed a total of 31 establishments manufacturing newsprint. Of this total 10 were reported in the State of New York, 5 in Minnesota, 4 each in Washington and Maine, 3 in Wisconsin, and 5 in other States. Enclosed you will find a table showing production by States for the calendar year 1929, compiled by the Bureau of the Census; also a table showing employment, pay rolls, and annual average earnings for the year 1928, 1930, 1932, and the first 6 months of 1933.

Trusting that this information will be of value to you, I am,
Very truly yours,

WILLARD L. THORP, Director.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin the President says that the newsprint industry in that part of the country might just as well fold up.

In 1933 the number of employees were 6,560, the pay roll $7,150,000, or an average annual pay roll of $1,090.

In 1932 the number of employees were 6,790, the pay roll $7,850,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,155. In 1930 the number of employees were 8,340, the pay roll $12,750,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,530. In 1928 the number of employees were 8,960, pay roll $13,500,000, and the average annual pay roll per worker $1,510.

The production by States is as follows: For New York, in 1929, 235,072 tons; Maine, 560,626; Wisconsin, 103,458; Minnesota, 121,563; Washington, 140,016; and all other States, 248,434 tons. Besides the number of workers engaged in these plants, it takes two or three times as many workers, because of the industries in existence in those particular States, to keep them in operation. The men who cut the wood, the farmers who sell paper wood, and many other people. May I say also that Mr. W. W. Pickard, of the N.R.A., who gave the Joint Committee on Printing information, stated that about 65 percent of the newsprint came from Canada, 5 percent from abroad, and 30 percent from America. Are we going to fold up 30 percent of the newsprint industry in this country because we put into the hands of the President of the United States this power? I say no. I say it is time for us to stop such foolishness. It is time for us to resume our authority as men and do what we were sent here for. We do not want to pass our rights over to someone in some department, not the President of the United States, because he must depend on somebody else for his information and guidance. I myself do not like the way some of his advisers are directing affairs. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, the policies of the administration as carried out through the Secretary of Agriculture in his efforts to relieve the farmer have always appeared to me to be the wildest of theories. I have wondered for some time just what benefits, if any, the Pennsylvania farmer was receiving from this program, and I am pleased to submit herewith a statement of one of the outstanding farmers in my district, Mr. John W. Cox, of Wilmington Township, Lawrence County, Pa., carried in the New Castle News, Friday, March 23, 1934.

It is encouraging to know that men and women on the farm are rising to the point of demanding common sense from those who administer the agricultural policies of the Federal Government. Congress will do well to heed the protests of practical farmers, who speak from years of experience, rather than those who theorize and do their farming at a mahogany desk.

There is much in this statement that we Members of Congress can profit from. I commend it to you all and suggest that we too adopt the same militant attitude. I might add that Mr. Cox does not know that I am presenting his statement to you; however, I feel certain he does not object if his words of wisdom are passed on to Congress. I am proud to number him among my constituents.

J. W. COX WRITES MORE ABOUT UNITED STATES HOG TAX

I have received congratulations and favorable comments from so many people on my newspaper article published on January 12 on Hog Tax and Farm Relief that I feel encouraged to make more protests against the payment of this unjust and exorbitant tax. I also feel encouraged to continue my efforts in behalf of the Pennsylvania farmer.

Recently I received a letter from the revenue collector, which reads as follows:

MARCH 13, 1934.

J. W. Cox,
Route 5, New Castle, Pa.:

You have been listed by this office as a processor of hogs under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which became effective as to that commodity on November 25, 1933.

Our records fail to indicate any return as a processor of hogs has been filed by you with this office. If you have slaughtered any hogs for market since the effective date of this act, return should be made on P.T. Form 4 for each month any slaughtering was done.

The rates of tax for the various months per hundred pounds live weight are as follows:

November, 50 cents; December and January, $1; February, $1.50; and beginning March 1, $2.25.

P.T. Forms 4 and 29 have been previously furnished you.

PRODUCERS

If you are a producer (that is, owner of the hog at the time of farrowing), no return is required until your sales or exchanges of pork products for the marketing year which began November 5, 1933, exceed 300 pounds, dressed weight.

In case your sales during the marketing year exceed 1,000 pounds dressed pork, you thereby lost the credit of 300 pounds' exemption and must include the 300 pounds for which exemption was taken in your return for the month that your sales exceed 1,000 pounds and pay on same.

If no processing has been done or if you are a producer and your sales and exchanges of pork products have not exceeded 300 pounds, please so advise, using the enclosed envelop, without postage, for making such reply.

DAVID L. LAWRENCE,
Collector of Internal Revenue.

This newspaper article is my reply to this letter.

In my former article I used the soft pedal, but it is out of order now and I will use the medium one. I do not believe that the hog tax is constitutional. If the Government only took 4 or 5 pigs out of every 100, it would be a tax; but when they confiscate from 20 to 35 out of every 100 it would constitute wholesale robbery, and that never was favored by the Government until recently, when they commenced to collect the hog tax.

You may think that I am Scotch. It is enough to make a Scotchman out of a spendthrift to buy western feed, pay a high freight rate, feed it into hogs, and then have the Government confiscate 35 percent of them, without giving anything in return, and hand it over to the western farmers.

The western farmers had their balmy days, when many of them worked during the summertime and spent the winters in Florida while the eastern farmers were working.

At the present time the tax is 2¼ cents per 100 pounds live weight. The tax on a 400-pound hog would be $9. A 400-pound hog will dress about 320 pounds. At 8 cents, the top market price per pound dressed, it would bring $25.60. Tax, $9. Balance left after paying tax, $16.60. Tax 35 percent for a hog that cost about $30 for feed and labor at 10 cents per hour.

Mr. Reader, suppose that you had a herd of 100 nice fat hogs, and some Government official would come around and drive 35 of them away; what would you think? You would probably want to send for that Mercer County man.

A New Castle merchant told me that if he was a farmer he would go to jail before he would pay any hog tax. I said I did not think that it would be much disgrace to go to jail for that. "No", he said, "I think that it would be an honor."

We have been accustomed to saving some hams to sell to our customers in the summer, but we did not save any this winter, except for our own use. We ground them into sausage and sold it before the price got as high as it is now. When our customers come around next summer and want to get one of those country-cured, hickory-smoked hams, they will be disappointed.

Farmers, take courage. We have the sympathy of the professional and business men who, I think, will render financial aid if necessary. We also have the consumers on our side.

Even the most ardent Democrat, if honest and intelligent, will admit that the Agricultural Adjustment Act will work a hardship on the eastern farmer. If he does not admit it, he automatically puts himself into another class.

The administration leaders will tell us that the eastern farmers will profit in the higher prices that they will receive for their pork next year, but how can they profit if they do not have any for sale? The eastern farmers are dependent on the West for much of their feed; and the corn-reduction program, which is a detriment to many of the eastern farmers, will force the price of grain up to where the farmers cannot afford to buy it and feed it into pigs with the possibility of a high tax on the pork. Instead of accepting some of the Government's easy money to decrease his crop acreage, he is going to be forced to increase his grain acreage wherever possible or go short on feed.

The majority of the eastern farmers cannot share in the wheat-reduction program, as they need all the straw that they can produce for bedding for their stock. The southern cotton growers received $112,000,000 last year to destroy their cotton and are to receive $125,000,000 in 1934 to reduce the acreage, $237,000,000. That seems like an immense sum to hand to those cotton growers so that they can sit around and enjoy themselves.

If we don't make a strong protest, we will be taxed on our cows, calves, chickens, eggs, and everything that we produce. I am opposed to the destruction of property and strikes such as the western farmers pulled off, but they succeeded in inducing the administration leaders to tax the eastern farmers and hand the money over to them. Something must be done, and done soon, to relieve this situation.

I quote from a bulletin issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, hog regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture with the approval of the President under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I think that President Roosevelt is sincere in trying to be helpful and on account of not being familiar with farm conditions is an innocent party to this adjustment act. It is not too late to remedy this situation and we are hoping that President Roosevelt will give it consideration soon. He promised that if he made mistakes that he would correct them.

Nearly all of the hog producers in this locality are hog processors as there is very little demand for live hogs.

A farmer from a neighboring township came to see me a few evenings ago to get some information regarding the hog tax. He regretted that he had sent to the revenue office for information and gave them possession of his name. He thinks that the only farmers that they will collect from are the ones whose names they now have.

They may create a lot of new jobs and put a man into every county in the United States at a high salary to check on every farmer who raised a hog and make him swear what he did with every pound of the meat.

I quote from the Pennsylvania Farmer the experience of a Northampton County farmer: "I did not know to whom to pay the tax and figure the exemption, so I wrote to our county agent. He wrote me giving me what knowledge he had and referred me to a collector for our county. I wrote him for blanks and information. None came. So I wrote to our Representative in Washington who sent me bulletins and amendments thereto. About 3 weeks later the collector came in person to me to 'fix up my tax.' I had my reports ready, but here is where the joker comes in. Because of ignorance of the law in this case I owed a penalty besides of 25 percent for November and December, by the time that I knew what and where and who and how. Another pleasant surprise because I could not get around to the right party in time who wanted my dollars."

It isn't high time—the time is just about past doing any good for us eastern farmers to wake up and plan our course or else we take the course of least resistance. The more we think over this sudden overproduction scare the more it seems nothing more than an excuse to tax everything we buy or sell to the limit of our endurance, and yet our public-school history teaches us to honor the noble heroes of pioneer days when they staged the Boston Tea Party.

This farmer surely has a grievance, and he expresses it in a mild way. Our administration leaders tell us that the way to bring back prosperity is to relieve the farmer and increase his purchasing power.

If one listens to the talks over the radio by the Government officials, it sounds rosy; but if you want to learn the true situation, ask some farmer.

I do not want to be so pessimistic, but I am driven to it. While I am in the proper mood I want to take a whack at our Pennsylvania State Legislature. While the taxpayers have been demanding economy they have continued squandering the State's money. At one of the recent sessions a bill was passed creating a milk-control board, consisting of three members, with an annual salary of $6,000 each. Total, $18,000 for salaries, and $100,000 for operating expenses. All legislative members who voted for that bill should be left at home the next session. Taxpayers, wake up. Talk will not get you very far. Get into action and do something. Comments on this letter, both favorable and unfavorable, will be appreciated. If the necessity exists and I get sufficient encouragement, I will write again, using the hard pedal.

JOHN W. COX,
Wilmington Township, Lawrence County.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 236

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, for a number of years I have been one of the board of trustees of a Negro community center in my home city known as "Hering House." I drew the deed of trust whereby a generous and public-spirited woman conveyed property worth many thousands of dollars to this board for the use of the colored citizens of South Bend. It serves the several purposes of a Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., and a community center. It works in closest cooperation with the white Y.M.C.A. and with the other social, religious, relief, and employment agencies of the city. It has been a creator of character. It has promoted harmony and understanding among all classes in our community.

No one who has given his time and means to its support has ever regretted it. I doubt if any dollar dedicated to character building and citizenship goes farther than it does there. My work on that board has been one of the things in my life in which I have the greatest satisfaction.

It was natural, therefore, that I listened with sympathetic interest to the speech made the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST]. I wish to commend him for his temperate and restrained remarks. He touched a high note when he said:

I have repudiated communism everywhere.

What he said confirms my own experience with the Negro race. They have been and are and will remain as loyal to the flag as any group in this country.

I think Mr. DE PRIEST's resolution should be adopted by the unanimous vote of the House. It does not attempt to prejudge or solve in advance any issue that is involved. It simply asks for an investigation by a committee of this House of a policy that was first established some 12 years ago and has since prevailed during three Republican and the present Democratic administration. It is not a partisan or political question.

Let the House, representing every congressional district in the Nation, appoint a fair-minded committee to work out a solution of this question that will promote good feeling among all classes of our citizens.

WHO DEFEATED THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY?

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, every daily newspaper in Wisconsin is lamenting the defeat of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, yet not a single editor mentions the prime cause of the 46 to 42 vote in the Senate, with a two-thirds vote necessary to adopt the treaty.

During the past 15 years Wisconsin and other Northwestern States have paid nearly a half million dollars to the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association or Charles P. Craig on the assumption that Craig and his association were pushing the waterway. Wisconsin alone has contributed more than $50,000.

This association's public record shows:

First. That it has never been militantly for the waterway.

Second. That it has always been indifferent and half-hearted in its support but militant in arousing opposition to the waterway.

Third. Until the treaty was actually introduced in the Senate the State of Illinois paid Craig's association thousands of dollars annually, and Illinois along with the railroad owners in New York has led the opposition to the waterway.

Fourth. The association wants a waterway on paper for political purposes, and their own acts and official record over the last 15 years proves they have never served any other purpose.

I contend the association never secured a single one of those 46 affirmative votes while its lukewarm lip service interspersed with enemy trades of dealing with the opposition doubtless contributed at least one half of those who cast the 42 votes against the treaty.

The association was deaf and dumb during the days preceding the vote. Then came defeat and immediately the association launches a campaign for a revised treaty to please the Illinois and other opponents of the waterway. On the strength of this new betrayal the association hopes to perpetuate itself in office and cash incomes. The people of the Northwestern States will continue to pay.

For 15 years the cause of the St. Lawrence waterway has been in the hands of its enemies and Wisconsin newspaperdom laments the effect and continues to ignore the cause. All of which causes this writer to join the Biblical character, Job, in the lament, "How long, O Lord, how long."

The St. Lawrence Tidewater Association lent its services to the Hoover campaign in 1928 and again in 1932. Early in 1928 I introduced a resolution urging immediate action on the St. Lawrence waterway and immediately Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State, called me to his office and asked me not to press my resolution. He showed me the confidential draft of a treaty with Canada and said that arrangements had been about completed looking to the nomination of Hoover and his election would insure the building of the waterway. Kellogg and Craig both told Members of Congress and the people of the Northwest to elect Hoover and we would get the waterway.

In 1928 the people did elect Hoover. He was President for 4 years and never even brought the treaty up for ratification. He betrayed the people of the Northwest who voted for him on that issue. The Tidewater Association betrayed them because never once during those 4 years Hoover was in office did Mr. Craig's association ever complain or insist that action on the treaty be had. Not once during those 4 years or since has Mr. Craig's association done a single act offensive to the Morgan-controlled railroad interests in New York or the power interests who own and operate the Chicago Drainage Canal.

Not a single opponent of the waterway has ever charged or expressed any resentment against Mr. Craig or the association because of their activities in behalf of the waterway.

Think of it! This association was paid over $500,000 in public cash, no accounting, no expense vouchers, no real records, over a period of 15 years, and they did not do enough for the waterway to incur the ire or even displeasure of a single opponent.

The people of Wisconsin and the Northwestern States want a waterway on the water to lower their cost of transportation on everything they sell and almost everything they buy. We want the waterway to restore water transportation, the one natural resource belonging to the Great Lakes States.

You will never get it with a milk-and-water organization representing us, like the St. Lawrence Tidewater Association want a waterway on paper for political purposes and to preserve their soft and extremely lucrative jobs.

If it had not been for President Roosevelt's support of the treaty, the waterway would never have had a chance of passage in the Senate. Everyone knows that. Yet the association under Mr. Craig was an active partisan supporter of Mr. Hoover in the last campaign and Hoover's backers were the Morgan-Mellon crowd who are fighting the waterway.

Once again I join Job in his deep and earnest lament, "How long, O Lord, how long."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 315

Resolved, That notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign enrolled bill of the House H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I call up a conference report on the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman withhold his unanimous-consent request for the present?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert in the Record the following tribute from various sections of the country other than his own, which they have recently paid to Representative WILLIAM B. OLIVER on the anniversary of 20 years' service as a Member of the House from the State of Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Everyone knows of the high esteem and respect in which the people of the State of Alabama hold the Honorable WILLIAM B. OLIVER. The following tributes from sections of the country other than his own have recently been paid to Representative WILLIAM B. OLIVER, of Alabama, on the anniversary of his 20 years of service as a Member of the House from Alabama:

Secretary of State Cordell Hull:

"The completion of 20 consecutive years of service in the House of Representatives is an event which calls for congratulations from the friends of the Member who has achieved so long a record. The congratulations, however, which I am offering to my friend, WILLIAM BACON OLIVER, on this occasion are not so much based on the length of his service, impressive though it is, as upon the scrupulous, conscientious, and able manner in which he has discharged the responsibilities intrusted to him.

"During my period of service in the House of Representatives it was my pleasure to know him as a colleague and as a friend. I had occasion then to become familiar with the high-minded manner in which he represented his district and with the wisdom which he brought to bear upon our national problems.

"I am therefore happy to pay tribute to this prominent citizen of Alabama and leader in our National Congress, and to offer to him and to the people of his State my congratulations at this milestone in a record which we hope will reach far into the future."

In a letter addressed to Congressman OLIVER by Attorney General Cummings he said:

"The records disclose that you have served the people of the Sixth Congressional District of Alabama in the House of Representatives for 20 years.

"It is, of course, common knowledge that your distinguished service has not been confined to your constituency. As the head of the Department of Justice, whose officers have been in intimate contact with you for many years, permit me to express my appreciation for your sympathetic cooperation and constant interest in the welfare and efficiency of this Department. Law enforcement in the United States owes much to your earnest and sincere work and helpful suggestions.

"I congratulate you upon the results of your long service. I congratulate the people of your district for their wisdom in retaining you in their and the country's service."

Secretary of the Navy Claude Swanson:

"I have known the ability and courage of my old friend from Alabama since my days in the United States Senate. I have always known the responsible position he has held as a leader in the party and in the House since the very first days he entered Congress two decades ago. He has shown the qualities of statesmanship that I am always proud to see in Members from the South. Always interested in the welfare of his State and his section, he has always shown that broad-minded nationalism which truly indicates a great American. We are all proud of him."

Secretary of Commerce Daniel C. Roper:

"I believe he is now rounding out two decades of service in the House of Representatives. It has been my pleasure to observe him intimately these 20 years, and I want to congratulate him on the splendid record which he has made during this time."

"Many men serve effectively and conscientiously for their districts, but few men serve their districts and the entire country as effectively. The former is a good Congressman; the latter is a statesman. These critical times emphasize the importance to the country of the breadth of service which comprehends our entire country. As a friend and as an American citizen I take pride in his record and in his conscientious and able service on the Appropriations Committee. I hope that he will be able to render many more years of such service, and I trust that many years of service lie before him."

Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins:

"Congratulations to Representative OLIVER in his 20 years of loyal and devoted service in his district, State, and Nation. It has been marked by courage, intelligence, and vision in the performance of tasks performed in the interests of all of the people of the Republic. During the past year it has been a source of gratification and pleasure to know him."

Speaker of the House of Representatives HENRY T. RAINES:

"As a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House he has handled the bills committed to his care with a wisdom and a thoroughness that has saved thousands of dollars to the taxpayers and to the Treasury. In the momentous days of the past year he has not only given loyal and devoted support to President Roosevelt but he has been a valiant champion of the new-deal program."

"In felicitating him on his twentieth anniversary of service in the House of Representatives I do so in the belief that he is now at the point of his greatest service to his constituents and to the country. I am confident that my appreciation of him and his services is shared by all of the Members of the House of Representatives, irrespective of party lines, and that his very high standing in the Congress must be a source of gratification to his constituents."

Senator JOSEPH ROBINSON, of Arkansas, Democratic floor leader:

"There is no better-liked Member of the House than Representative OLIVER. There is no leader so responsive to a call from his leader at the White House. During the many years I have known him he has been an effective public servant to his district and State. He has always exhibited those qualities of statesmanship which have marked our most noted Members of either body of Congress."

Representative JOSEPH BYRNS, of Tennessee, Democratic floor leader:

"No man in the House has rendered more devoted and faithful life service to his district, State, and Nation than BUCK OLIVER, who has just completed 20 years of service in the House. I served with him for many years on the Appropriations Committee. I know that his influence is felt in all of our legislative deliberations. In addition to that, he is one of the most influential and popular Members of the House. The people of his district are to be congratulated on their representation here."

Senator McKELLAR, of Tennessee:

"I have known Representative OLIVER since our days in the University of Alabama and he has always been one of my closest friends. I wish to join with others in congratulating him on his long service as a Member of the House. I know that he has devoted his life to the service of his district and State, and it is gratifying to know that this service has been recognized by his fellow Alabamians. He has shown those qualities of statesmanship which have marked the greatest figures in our national history."

Representative SNELL, of New York, Republican floor leader:

"Although on the opposite side of the aisle, I have always admired the ability and courage with which Representative OLIVER has handled his appropriation bills, whether in the majority or in the minority. He has always been eminently fair to Members on both sides. This has enabled him to do much effective work for his party. I admire his statesmanlike qualities."

Representative BUCHANAN, of Texas, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee:

"Representative OLIVER has been one of the most valuable members of my committee. He has helped save his country millions of dollars each year. To him has been entrusted some of the most important appropriation bills, including those for the Navy and other large Federal departments. He is an expert in fiscal matters and his judgment is trusted by me and every other member of our committee."

Mrs. GREENWAY, Representative from Arizona:

"Some people are truly what the rest of us would like to be, and Congressman OLIVER is an example. He possesses self-restraint that bespeaks wisdom and strength, modesty that evidences the habit of power, and a presence that all unconsciously revives and sustains one's faith in the ideal of public service. To hear his least comment is to recognize a statesman."

Representative CONNERY, Chairman of the Labor Committee, Massachusetts:

"Representative OLIVER is one of my close personal friends. I have always admired him as one of our finest Members; courteous, kindly, able, and courageous. In those matters in which I have been particularly interested Mr. OLIVER has always exhibited the keenest and most sympathetic interest. He has the courage of his convictions and always votes as he believes is in the best interest of his country. No Member of the House enjoys in larger degree the respect and confidence of his colleagues than Mr. OLIVER, on both sides of the aisle. In presenting important appropriation bills assigned to him he is always informative and his remarks carry conviction. I may say he is one of the most indispensable Members of the House."

Representative TABER, of New York, member of the Appropriations Committee:

"For 12 years Representative OLIVER and I have been on the committee together. During that time he and I have been close personal friends. There is no man who gives more of himself to the public service than he does. I am delighted to congratulate him on his 20 years as a Member of the House."

Representative COOPER of Ohio, Republican member of Interstate Commerce Committee:

"Congressman OLIVER has been in Congress as long as I have. He has been a worthy foe on the other side of the aisle. We have always seen eye to eye on labor problems. He has always been a friend of organized labor and the workingman. I congratulate him on his long service."

Representative PATMAN, of Texas:

"I think Congressman OLIVER is one of the most sincere and able men in the House. He has as many friends as any other Member of the House. I think this is particularly important in view of the fact that as a Congressman he has two constituencies—one his district and one the House. A Representative cannot work as effectively for his district unless he is popular in his House district. I have been most impressed with the efficient and courageous manner with which Mr. OLIVER has been able to handle the important bills assigned to him on the floor."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by including a certain portion of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture on the sugar bill in order to give the information requested by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

C. W. WOODRUM,
ROBERT L. BACON,
FLORENCE P. KAHN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. So far as I know, there is no opposition on this side to the conference report, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] would like a few minutes on the conference report.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I may say to the gentleman from New York that the senior minority member of the subcommittee [Mr. BACON] was called away on account of a death in his family. He told me that he was in hearty concurrence with the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. He so advised me.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I want to commend the distinguished services of our colleague, WILLIAM B. OLIVER, who has now served in this House for 20 years. He is even known up in the wicked North, in my district, where he has a friend in Col. James E. Dedman, who is in charge of the Castle Point Hospital, and every time I see him he wants to know how his old friend, BUCK OLIVER, is. Belonging to the other party, I am glad to state, without fear of contradiction, that Representative

OLIVER is an outstanding leader of his party and typifies in the House, from long training and experience, what a Member with such seniority should be. He has the ability, industry, and knowledge to legislate properly and intelligently; and as a ranking Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I want to commend him for his knowledge of foreign affairs upon the Appropriations Committee and congratulate him on the way he has handled such appropriations in his committee. [Applause.] I know full well that all Members of the House on this side join with me in hoping he will be here for another 20 years. [Applause.]

I wish to say a few words about that part of this conference report which calls for an appropriation of $1,100,000 for an embassy at Moscow.

About 4 months ago, when the President suddenly determined on recognizing Soviet Russia, the members of the "brain trust" who were most active in trying to show preference to Russia, told the American people that we would do a billion dollars' worth of trade if we merely recognized the Soviet Government and that it would buy hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of cotton from us.

I take this occasion to point out that last year, or in 1933, we only did $8,717,000 worth of export trade with Russia, and in 1932 our exports amounted to $12,466,000, and yet we are providing an embassy over there that will cost probably $1,200,000 before we are through, or one seventh of the amount of our export trade. We exported to Germany about $139,000,000 worth of our goods in 1933, and we have no embassy building there.

I am not opposing this appropriation. So long as we have recognized Soviet Russia, we should have an embassy, and we should have a dignified embassy, but I am pointing out that if we are going to build an embassy in Moscow we at least should build one in Berlin and one in Rome. Over 100 American citizens will go to Berlin and Rome for every one that goes to Moscow; and so far as trade is concerned, our trade with both of the other countries is at least 10 times as much as it is with Russia.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I recognize the importance of our trade with both of the countries to which the gentleman has referred. I think a mistake was made by the Foreign Building Commission in the purchase of old buildings in Berlin and also in Rome. The gentleman from New York will recall that we now own a building in Rome and one in Berlin, the one in Berlin cost about $1,750,000, and the one in Rome about $1,250,000. We had hoped that one of the buildings in Rome could be transformed into a residence, but later we found this to be impracticable. I feel the purchase was a mistake and for that reason we inserted in this bill a proviso that no part of this money should be used for the purchase of old buildings.

Mr. FISH. After we have passed this legislation and provide this money for building an American Embassy building in Moscow, I hope the gentleman will help to provide sufficient funds to build one in Berlin and one in Rome.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes, and I may say to the gentleman that we do own a building in Berlin which cost $1,750,000.

Mr. FISH. That building burned down.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No.

Mr. FISH. It was gutted by a fire and is not being used.

We do not own the ground at Moscow; we take it on a 99-year lease, and therefore we do not control the land. It is located 2½ miles out of the center of Moscow. How American citizens are going to get there, I do not know. There are no taxicabs. It is out of the center of the city where the hotels are located and where business will be done. You might as well build an embassy in Chevy Chase as to build this where we are building it.

It is a beautiful location in a park on the Moscow River and will make a beautiful residence for the Ambassador, but as far as the American citizens are concerned, I do not know how they are going to get there unless we establish a fleet of taxicabs.

I made a few remarks the other day in which I said I had come to the conclusion that Mr. William C. Bullitt, our Ambassador, was a pretty smart man, that he knew a good deal about Russia and might be smart enough to be able to take care of himself. Only yesterday, however, I read in a newspaper that our new Ambassador at Moscow for whom we are providing this palatial residence, is about to enter into an agreement with high Soviet officials in an effort to have the United States and Soviet Russia enter into the League of Nations together. That is the report in the newspaper. I hope we are not paying an American Ambassador to go to Moscow in order to get us into the League of Nations with Soviet Russia. I believe in keeping out of entangling alliances, and in not getting into any agreement with Soviet Russia or any other foreign nation for the purpose of entering the League of Nations. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very gracious remarks of my good friend, the gentleman from New York, it is difficult for me just now to disagree with him about anything. [Laughter.]

I may say that the President of the United States from newspaper statements is not at this time in favor of our entering the League of Nations. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman that the cost of the Embassy in Moscow is to be less than the cost of the Embassy in Tokyo, and it is thought that the Embassy they have planned in Moscow will be far more complete. It is a beautiful location, as reported to the committee, and the committee seemed to be in full agreement as to the suitability of the site.

The President sent a very strong letter to both the House and the Senate in favor of this program. It involves a 99-year lease at a nominal yearly payment of $2,000, which is less than one half of 1 percent of the actual value of the land, the conferees were informed.

I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, before I address myself to the conference report, I would like to take this opportunity to say something about my good friend Buck in addition to what my colleague from New York has just said.

The gentleman from Alabama knows a lot about foreign affairs, but I want to say that he knows more about naval affairs than he does about foreign affairs. He is highly regarded for the work he has done on the Naval Affairs Legislative Committee as well as on the Appropriations Committee during his 20 years in Congress. While we all love you, Buck, some of us had an idea that you might want to go to the Senate some day from your State, so I hope you will not stay here for another 20 years, because you will then be too old to go to the Senate. Your constituents do themselves proud when they reelect you from time to time.

I rose to call attention to one or two items in the conference report. There appears to be a million dollars additional in the first item, amendment numbered 2, and another million in amendment numbered 3. They are very much alike, one applying to living-quarters allowances, amendment numbered 2, and the other applying to allowances for rent and heat, and so forth. They are very much alike, yet there is a million dollars added in each of these instances. How does that come about?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. While the gentleman is correct in stating that there is an increase—to be exact, $954,000—in both amendment no. 2 and amendment no. 3, amendment no. 2 merely increases the amount of the limitation by that sum while amendment no. 3 actually increases the appropriation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Why was it necessary to increase the House appropriation $1,000,000 in each instance?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The appropriation was increased only to the extent of $954,000, as indicated by amendment no. 3. The House appropriation carried a very limited amount for that purpose, and the State Department, with the approval of the Budget, recommended that additional sum on account of the unusual conditions now prevailing abroad in many countries. We have put the same limitation on the amount that may be expended that has been carried in former years, and the whole matter will be very carefully watched, with a view to seeing that no excessive allowances are made to any Ambassador, Foreign Service officers, or clerks.

Mr. BRITTEN. By the usual allowances the gentleman means the $3,000 in one instance and the $1,700 in the other for the Foreign Service officer?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; the amounts you mention are the maximum limits.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is any of this amount made necessary by the exchange situation in the past year because we have gone off the gold standard?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That may enter into it, but this appropriation will be taken into account in any sums hereafter submitted for deficiency appropriations to cover the exchange situation the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BRITTEN. I listened with considerable interest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in what I will not call his opposition to the $1,165,000 appropriation for a new building in Moscow, and I think that when we aim to appropriate $1,000,000 for an embassy or an embassy residence in a country like Russia, where the location of the capital is always in doubt, that we should be very careful. The capital has changed several times. We have had one experience in Turkey in that respect, where we had a very beautiful legation building at Constantinople, and when the Government became weak they just moved the capital 1,000 miles or more to the east. China has done the same. I have been in Russia during recent years, and my impression is that there is danger in erecting any million-dollar building in Moscow because of the instability of the Government itself.

Gentlemen may say that the Government has been going on for 8 or 9 years, and that it is not unstable, but the capital of Russia was at one time in Peterhoff, named after Peter the Great. It was then moved from there to St. Petersburg, and that still was named after Peter the Great. The name of St. Petersburg was then changed to Leningrad, and it stayed there for a while, and finally was moved to Moscow. My impression is that the logical place for the capital is not Moscow but the place where the capital was for a long time, Leningrad. They may move back there, and if they did, the rental of a building over there would be vastly to our advantage rather than putting up a million-dollar structure, which would be useless for any local use, because the Russians do not live as we do. I am glad that the House conferees insisted on amending the amendment by providing for a new building and not the purchase of an old one, because I had carried in my files for some time this notation about the Embassy in Moscow that our Ambassador had gotten over there and had purchased an enormous building. The report that I have in mind states:

Ambassador Bullitt (William C.) will sleep in a baby-blue bedroom, adjoining a bathroom 25 feet square, surrounded by all the glories of the Czarist era.

The embassy is the palatial 40-room mansion of Russia's former sugar king (Tverkov) and has been re-done for Bullitt, but all of the dangling chandeliers and stained-glass windows and marble staircases and heavy damask hangings of the vanished days have been preserved.

A dining room will seat 300 people.

The show place of the embassy is the ballroom, surrounded by marble columns and decorated with crystal chandeliers 10 feet in diameter.

The reception hall will accommodate 40 couples for dancing.

There are eight master bedrooms.

The building was completed just before the World War. The owner was shot during the revolution, and the building has since been used by various Bolshevik political bureaus.

That type of building could always be sold for something over there in the event of the removal of the capital, but the kind of building that we are going to build for more than a million and a quarter would be useless to Russians in any walk of life. I think the gentleman's amendment is good, because it will provide for the expenditure of American money for American type of construction.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not know whether that is an accurate description of the building the gentleman refers to or not.

Mr. BRITTEN. This came from over there.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the full allowance which the State Department is permitted to make for rent, heat, and light is made to the Ambassador to Russia, he will still have to pay a very substantial amount as rent for this building. The building program which we are here providing funds for does not contemplate simply a residence for the Ambassador, but there will be quarters for all of our Foreign Service representatives who are stationed at Moscow. Likewise, there will be offices for all representatives from the different departments of our Government who may be stationed there.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is an Embassy for official purposes and a residence as well?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the idea of the plan?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am very glad to have the gentleman's viewpoint, because I regard his opinion very highly, but I am sorry that at this time, when there is so much being said about Red activities—and there is a great deal of it in the big cities especially, much more than most of us comprehend—we should at this time be more or less throwing a flower or a kiss to the Bolsheviks in Russia. Call them what you please—Communists, Soviet States, or otherwise. I think it will be misconstrued. It will look like a little flattery. It will look as though we are going out of our way to cater to the Russians when, as the gentleman from New York said awhile ago, we might be catering in some other more desirable direction.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I say to the gentleman that I recognize there are differences of opinion, of course, as to the probable effect of the President's recognition of Russia, but I believe those who are best acquainted with conditions throughout the world feel that in recognizing Russia the President has done much to silence all rumors of war in the near future and has made a real contribution to world peace.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not complaining about the recognition of Russia. I was speaking of the unwisdom of spending all this money now in Russia, at a time when there is so much unrest and so much fear of Communist propaganda here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I simply wish to ask the gentleman some questions. Of course, my tribute to my friend and colleague from Alabama is in the Record, which I have asked unanimous consent to extend, together with the Members of the House, the distinguished Cabinet members, and other people.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. All of which are very deeply appreciated.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman deserves all of that tribute. I should like to ask the gentleman if the entire $4,000,000 for the Unemployment Service is now in the bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. It is $3,700,000.

Mr. CONNERY. When the Wagner-Peyser bill was before the Committee on Labor we brought in the three legislative representatives of the veterans' organizations, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled Veterans' organization, and the American Legion, on the question of offering an amendment to the bill which would provide for separate offices for the veterans. It was made very plain at that time, when those amendments were passed, that a separate office was to be set up every place where we had an employment office, for the purpose of obtaining positions for veterans, and they were to be in charge of a veteran. Since the law went into effect they have not been doing that, have they?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; they have not.

Mr. CONNERY. Yet it is clearly written into the bill, because we felt that a disabled veteran coming into a United States employment office would find it more difficult to get a position than an ordinary man, because a manufacturer would not want a disabled veteran, and we felt a veteran should be in charge of the office, or at least a veteran should be in charge of the veterans' part of it, to try to get positions for the disabled men. Did anything come up about that in the conference?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Permit me to say that the statements made by my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts when this bill was before the House led me to conclude when we were in conference that there should be a proviso requiring that the minimum amount to be expended for veterans' placement service should be not less than $200,000, and such a proviso is carried in the conference report, which sum is an increase of $56,000 over what the Bureau stated they expected to spend for this service. In view of the gentleman's statement as to what the committee, of which he is the distinguished chairman, felt was the purpose and intent of that legislation, and how he felt it should be construed by the Department of Labor, I am confident they will make a liberal allowance for the veterans' placement service. They cannot spend less than $200,000.

Mr. CONNERY. One thing more. We have unemployment set-ups in many of the States, and the Government is going to cooperate with them, under the Wagner-Peyser bill. Will they take care of the States that do not have those set-ups?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In other words, will they go into States to try to encourage those employment offices?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because I think every Member will be interested in this statement. The gentleman has correctly stated that the Wagner-Peyser Act provided that for the first 2 years the appropriations might be expended in setting up Federal employment offices without requiring the States to match the allocations made to the States.

We find that for the first year the Department had not been carrying out the law in this regard. So after this bill went to the Senate, and after the House had denied the full amount recommended by the Budget, since we did not want to pile up appropriations unless they were to be spent, I conferred with the Secretary of Labor and found that she was entirely sympathetic to setting up immediately these Federal employment offices in every State, under authority vested in the Secretary by the Wagner-Peyser law, and there will be speedily set up in every State employment offices within the limits of the amounts which the appropriations for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935 allow to the several States for this purpose. Forty legislatures meet early in 1935, and if these employment offices are rendering a worthwhile service we feel sure that the States will see that the offices are continued by matching Federal appropriations for the fiscal year 1936, since the law requires this beginning with the fiscal year 1936.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman inform us what the architecture of this building will be? There is a rumor that it will be something like our university down at Monticello, Va.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that is the tentative plan they are considering.

Mr. GOSS. Has it been approved?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I cannot say it has been approved. A commission composed of 3 Cabinet officers, 2 members from the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, and 2 members from the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate constitute the Foreign Building Commission and are clothed with full authority to determine the type and character of the buildings to be constructed within the limits of the appropriation carried.

Mr. GOSS. Is it to be built by Russian labor?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think only unskilled Russian labor will be used; and all of the material except such as cannot be transported at a reasonable cost will be purchased and transported from this country.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 5 and agree to the same with the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 8: Page 15, lines 2 and 3, strike out "$3,500; in all, $579,948" and insert the following: "$4,075; in all, $580,523, together with such additional sums, due to increases in rates of exchange as may be necessary to pay in foreign currencies the quotas and contributions required by the several treaties, conventions, or laws establishing the amount of the obligation for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 8 and agree to the same with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 19: Page 33, line 15, after "$10,000", insert the following: "Provided further, That reports be submitted to the Congress on the 1st day of July and January showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation or amount of any fee paid to each, together with a description of their duties."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment no. 21: Page 44, after line 23, insert the following: "Provided, That a report be submitted to Congress on the 1st day of the next regular session showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation paid to each, together with a description of their duties."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I think this statement will prove of interest: All of the increases inserted by the Senate represent Budget estimates submitted by the President to the Senate after the bill left the House. It may be of interest also to know that for the fiscal year 1932 there was appropriated for these four departments $139,069,937.34. The pending bill for these same four departments carries $88,884,522, showing a saving since the fiscal year 1932 of $50,185,415.34. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the action was taken on the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

SIGNING BY VICE PRESIDENT OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a statement which the Clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Chair desires to announce that, under authority of the order of the Senate, he signed, after the recess on yesterday, the enrolled bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, said bill having previously been reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills as having been examined and found truly enrolled.

REPEAL OF ALASKA PROHIBITION LAW

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, is necessarily absent on business of the Senate. I wish to present a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration out of order.

The bill (S. 2729) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes, contains the following provision:

Provided, That the Governor of the Territory of Alaska, from and after the passage and approval of this act, shall have the power and authority to grant pardons to persons theretofore convicted of violations of the aforesaid act of February 14, 1917.

In the opinion of many authorities, including the Chief Executive, and, I think, also the Attorney General, that proviso is unconstitutional. I am, therefore, presenting for the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] a concurrent resolution requesting that the President return Senate bill 2729 to the Senate in order that it may be revised. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 11) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2729, 73d Cong., 2d sess.) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very illuminating and interesting address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] at Chicago on the 21st of this month before the Chicago Association of Commerce, pertaining to the remonetization of silver.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The present generation of Americans look upon bimetalism as Bryanism and do not take the trouble to study the history or science of money as well understood long prior to the Bryan campaign.

The truth is that Alexander Hamilton, the greatest Secretary of the Treasury, in the minds of many Republicans, up to the advent of Andrew Mellon, in his able and invaluable report of 1791, on the establishment of the mint, declared that "to annul the use of either gold or silver as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full circulation with the evils of a scanty circulation. It seems most advisable not to attach the unit to either of the metals because this cannot be done effectually without destroying the office and character of them as money, and reducing it to the situation of mere merchandise." How true those words of Hamilton have proved to be.

THE PRESENT GENERATION OF AMERICANS

As late as in May 1894 a cable message was sent to the Lord Mayor of London by leading United States Senators of both parties, as follows:

"We desire to express our cordial sympathy with the movement to promote the restoration of silver by international agreement in aid of which we understand a meeting is to be held today under Your Lordship's presidency. We believe that the free coinage of both gold and silver by international agreement at a fixed ratio would secure to mankind the blessing of a sufficient volume of metallic money, and, what is hardly less important, secure to the world of trade immunity from violent exchange fluctuations."

Who do you suppose were among the signers of that cablegram? Henry Cabot Lodge, Republican Senator from Massachusetts; W. E. Chandler, Republican, from New Hampshire; Nelson W. Aldrich, Republican, from Rhode Island; Shelby M. Cullom, Republican, from Ohio; W. B. Allison, Republican, from Iowa; Calvin S. Brice, Democrat, from Ohio; S. S. Platt, Republican, from Connecticut; A. P. Gorman, Democrat, from Maryland; John Sherman, Republican, from Ohio, Secretary of Treasury under Hayes and Secretary of State under McKinley.

It should be remembered that these men, conservative Republicans and Democrats that they were, were for the remonetization of silver at a definite fixed ratio, believing that it would be to the best interests of the people of the world. They wanted an international agreement, which was unobtainable then and has been ever since, because Great Britain wanted then, and wants today, cheap raw materials from India and America. These men were afraid at that time that because of the fact that we were a debtor nation and owed Great Britain and other European countries large sums of money that we could not maintain the bimetallic system alone.

Since the war that has completely changed, and I have no doubt but that if these great statesmen, both Democrats and Republicans alike, were in the Senate today they would stand shoulder to shoulder with those of us who are fighting for this country to remonetize silver independently and alone. They would have the foresight to see and know that this country, being the greatest creditor nation in the world and occupying a position in finance and leadership such as no other nation has ever occupied, can remonetize silver, and thereby force England and other countries, if they want to retain their oriental business, to do the same thing.

To those of you who fear that we would be flooded with silver let me say to you that the only way you can lose your gold, provided there was no embargo on it, would be by having trade balances run against you over a period of years.

If we should remonetize silver, we would prevent the Orient from dumping their products upon us and we would make it possible for them to buy from us, which they are practically unable to do today. It would raise the cost of production to their manufacturers as well as the cost of production of their raw materials.

These Senators who signed the cablegram call attention to exchange fluctuation, the very thing from which the world has been suffering since the war, and suffering from it because of the fact that there is not a sufficient amount of gold to meet the new demands of commerce and trade even in the Western World. A further reason is the fact that practically two countries have cornered the gold of the world and other countries have been unable to get what we call primary money upon which to base their currency and their credit.

The World War brought about a complete disruption of monetary stability everywhere. At the end of the conflict, all the countries of the world were off the gold standard, either through suspension of redemption or through embargoes on gold exports, and the foreign exchange rates fluctuated widely in spite of attempts made by countries to minimize these oscillations by means of control devices. For a period of several years after the war, the United States was the only country that had returned to the full gold standard.

The international bankers met at Brussels in 1920 and in Genoa in 1922, with the distinct purpose in view of placing the countries of the world back on the gold standard. They stated in substance that a return to the gold standard was indispensable to economic reconstruction. Between 1923 and 1929, in part as a result of international cooperation, as in the case of Austria, Hungary, and Germany, and in part as a result of independent action, virtually the whole world returned to a gold standard either formally or de facto. The notable exceptions were China and Persia, which were on the silver standard, and Brazil, Spain, Turkey, and several smaller countries, which were still operating on the basis of inconvertible paper.

A second break-down of the gold standard occurred after the economic depression was well under way until practically every nation in the world abandoned the gold standard, and depreciated currencies followed in its wake. England depreciated her currency approximately 33 percent, Argentina about 40 percent, and Japan about 60 percent.

There are three kinds of money in every capitalistic state; primary money, currency money, and credit or debt money. Under the right rule of capitalism there are fixed proportions of these three moneys if a sound and adequate money is available. The proportions are these: $1 of basic money, $2.50 of currency, $12 of credit.

When France and the United States obtained 70 percent of all the monetary gold in the world, the rest of the countries which had been on the gold standard lost their primary money. If they wanted to regain that primary money, it became necessary for them to contract their currency and their credit; in other words, deflate—drive the prices of their commodities down so that they could sell them cheaper on the world market; increase their trade balances. The other alternative was for them to depreciate their currencies or, in other words, issue paper money and issue credit, regardless of the amount of gold which they had, and thus recapture their trade in the world markets.

They followed the latter course, and practically every nation in the world went off the gold standard. I think it is of the greatest importance that we understand and appreciate what effect depreciated currencies have had upon our trade and commerce.

When England went off the gold standard and her currencies depreciated 30 percent, did that give England any advantage in the world markets? It certainly did. Ex-President Hoover stated: "The depreciation of foreign currencies lowers the cost of production abroad compared to our costs of production." If the depreciation of foreign currencies lowers the cost of production, as President Hoover correctly stated, Japan with her depreciated currency of 60 percent, Argentina with a depreciated currency of 40 percent, and China with a depreciated currency by reason of the low price of silver, have a distinct advantage over the producers of raw materials and producers of manufactured articles in the United States of America.

The president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States made the statement some time ago to this effect: "Over half of the products coming into the United States are benefiting from the advantage of depreciated currencies. Over 20 foreign countries have that advantage in undercutting the prices of American products."

When England went off of the gold standard many of her statesmen boasted of the fact that she would have an advantage by reason of her depreciated currency, but when I stood upon the floor of the Senate and called attention to the fact that the low price of silver meant depreciated currencies in China and the Orient, few, if any, at first gave heed to my remarks because of the prejudice that existed since the campaign of '96.

Let me repeat, low-price silver means depreciated currencies in the Orient; depreciated currencies in the Orient mean lower cost of production to her manufacturers, her cotton and wheat producers, and inability on her part to purchase manufactured goods from this country because, to the extent that she has silver, her buying power is decreased.

Is it not about time that the people of the United States lay aside not only their racial and religious prejudices but that they likewise lay aside their economic prejudices; that they stop following a few international bankers who have for the past few years dominated our economic, financial, and political life to the great detriment of the American people? They have by their false doctrines brought us right up to the abyss.

Let us see what the demonetization of silver has done to the manufacturers of this country.

I obtained the following figures from the United States Department of Commerce: In 1912 the number of cotton spindles in Japan was 2,177,000, and in 1932, 7,965,000. In 1912 Japan had 22,000 looms, and in 1932, 79,000. During this same 20-year period from 1912 to 1932 her exports of cotton goods increased as follows: Number of yards exported to China in 1912 was 168,000,000, and in 1932, 194,000,000. This increase was not very great, due to the fact that China was also developing her textile industry during this same period of time. But let us see what happened in other countries.

In 1912 Japan exported to India 8,000,000 square yards, and in 1932, 645,000,000 square yards. During this same period of 20 years her exports to East India increased from 2,000,000 yards to 352,000,000 yards, and to Egypt the increase was from 36,000 yards to 195,000,000 yards; in Australia the increase was from 3,000,000 yards to 36,000,000 yards; in the Philippines, from 5,000,000 yards to 21,000,000; and to South America, from 76,000 yards in 1912 to 27,000,000 in 1932.

In China the number of spindles in 1915 was 1,009,000, and in 1932 had increased to 4,612,000, while during this same period the number of looms in China increased from 4,564 to 40,000, while the increase in the production of cotton yarn was about 225,000,000 pounds in 1915 to about 933,000,000 pounds in 1932, and her increase in the production of cotton cloth was from 50,000,000 yards in 1915 to 800,000,000 yards in 1932.

In India the increase in production in the textile industry was not as pronounced as in China or Japan, yet we have a considerable development. The number of spindles in India in 1912 was 6,464,000, and in 1932, 9,508,000; the number of looms was 89,000 in 1912, and 186,000 in 1932. The production of cotton yarn in India was 683,000 pounds in 1912, and in 1932, 1,016,000 pounds. The production of cotton cloth increased from 2,350,000,000 yards in 1912 to 4,670,000,000 yards in 1932.

During this same time American exports of cotton cloth decreased as follows: To British India, from 13,748,000 yards in 1913 to only 2,048,000 yards in 1932; to China our exports decreased from 80,462,000 square yards in 1913 to 1,420,000 yards in 1932.

There are some so-called "economists" who claim that the demonetization of silver did not materially affect our foreign commerce because nations try to balance their imports with their exports. The fallacy of this is apparent when we study the above figures furnished by the Department of Commerce. No juggling of figures or economic theories can alter the fact that low production costs in the Orient are driving our textile manufacturers out of the world markets and threatening to capture our home market as well.

On January 4, 1934, an Associated Press dispatch was to this effect:

"The United States may expect a restricted market for its raw cotton in Japan this year as a result of an Indo-Japanese commercial agreement obligating Japan to buy 1,500,000 bales of Indian raw cotton annually.

"This is in return for exportation of 400,000,000 square yards of Japanese cotton textiles to India each year."

I have always contended that the low price of silver would not only increase the number of spindles in the manufacturing plants of the Orient, but it would likewise force those countries into the production of raw materials, as they could not long afford to buy raw materials from a gold-standard country.

The President recognized this situation when he, by his silver proclamation, entered upon the policy of buying newly mined American silver, but the effect of that was not, I am sure, what the President expected it to be, because the purchase of newly mined silver could not and did not affect the world price of commodities. The President's proclamation amounted only to giving a subsidy to the silver-mining companies of America for newly mined silver, but if you remonetized silver under my bill you would not only increase the purchasing power of the people of silver-using countries but the value of all property in those countries in terms of money would increase many times.

It is a fact, not a theory, supported not only by the best known authorities but by the common sense of every individual who carefully investigates the situation that the bullion value of silver directly influences and governs the price of wheat, cotton, and all other products raised in nations on a silver monetary basis. Anyone of ordinary intelligence or rightfully outside the wards of idiocy or the insane asylums appreciates the fact that the products of all nations on a gold monetary basis which are sold in competition with similar products raised by nations on a silver monetary basis are also directly affected by the bullion value of silver. The prices of such products rise as the bullion value of silver rises and fall as the bullion value of silver falls. In evidence of the correctness of these statements I quote from the report of the British Royal Commission on gold and silver, held in 1887. Before this commission Mr. J. Shield Nicholson, professor of political economy at the University of Edinburgh, and one of the most distinguished economists of Great Britain, gave his evidence in reference to the effect of the competition of India on the price of American and English wheat. The following question, which is precisely to the point, was put to Mr. Nicholson by a member of the commission:

"Indian wheat is the very wheat that is complained of by Secretary Manning, Secretary of the United States Treasury, as having lowered the price of European and American wheat, and he attributes it all to the divergence of gold from silver. You do not think that tying gold and silver again would raise the price of English and American wheat by 25 percent?"

In his reply Professor Nicholson discusses the factors entering into the determination of prices under given conditions, and on the point immediately germane to the point under discussion says:

"Now it seems to me probable if the price of silver rose to its old level, wheat could not be profitably exported from India until prices rose in a corresponding degree. For India, being a silver country, the price of wheat there is independent of the relative value of gold and silver. An exporter to England at the present time will give the Indian price in silver and he can buy his silver for less gold, and thus in competition will lower the price. If the price of silver rose, the exporter from India must get more gold. Thus, a rise of silver would, on this view, raise the price of wheat to a corresponding degree."

Should anyone desire further evidence on this point we would call their attention to Mr. Daniel's work on the Industrial Competition of Asia; also Mr. Bagehot's work on the Depreciation of Silver. Mr. Bagehot, in his work just referred to, on page 54, very tersely expresses this fact, as follows:

"The necessary effect of a depreciation of silver as against gold is to give us a bounty on exports from India and the other silver-using countries to England. An English merchant can now buy many more rupees than he formerly could with the same number of sovereigns, and therefore he can import from India, though prices at Calcutta are not at a level at which it would have paid him to operate if he had not had the novel facility in getting rupees."

At a meeting of the British and colonial chambers of commerce held in London, 1886, Sir Robert Fowler, a member of Parliament, a banker, and ex-Mayor of London, made the following statement:

"The effect of the depreciation of silver must finally be the ruin of the wheat and cotton industries of America and be the development of India as the chief wheat and cotton exporter of the world."

No better arguments in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver can be advanced in the United States than the arguments of the gold monometallists advanced in Europe. The conditions are exactly reversed on the two continents. The United States are producers of breadstuffs and raw materials—exporters; Europe, or particularly Great Britain, are consumers of breadstuffs and raw materials—importers.

The terrible irony of the situation is in the fact that as gold appreciates in value due to our large stocks of monetary gold, and to the so-called "stability" of our monetary system, and our great commercial and industrial strength, the prices of commodities fall, while nations not able to maintain the gold standard, and whose currencies depreciate accordingly, enjoy commercial advantages due to their depreciated currency over those countries which are strong enough to remain on the gold standard. That is why, in England and in other countries that have depreciated their currencies, conditions have been improving and unemployment has decreased. What at first thought appears to be a blessing becomes the curse. What shall it profit a country if it gain all the gold of the world and lose its commerce?

Many remedies have been tried during the past few years to restore prosperity, but they have failed because they did not go to the roots of our economic ills. They aimed to relieve the situation but not to cure it, in the hope that in some mysterious manner prosperity would suddenly appear around that famous corner. Changes were made in our banking laws, liberalizing them in the interests of the bankers; tariff measures were passed with the assurance that prosperity would return within 60 days after the passage of the bill; millions of peoples' money were given to the railroads, the big banks, and insurance companies, but still the depression continued, and as the days lengthened into months and the months into years, our economic conditions gradually became worse; more farmers were losing their farms through foreclosure or bankruptcy; more home owners were losing their homes through tax sales; more railroads were going into the hands of receivers; more banks were failing, bringing ruin to their depositors; and more people were joining the ranks of the unemployed, tramping the streets in search of food and clothing.

The administration under the leadership of President Roosevelt has sought to prevent European countries with their depreciated currencies from gaining an advantage over the United States in the world markets by cutting the gold content of the dollar. He has sought to aid the banks, and by cutting down the acreage under the so-called "allotment plan" he has sought to help the farmers. He has put 4,000,000 people to work under the C.W.A.

All of these things which he has adopted were probably necessary in order to prevent one of the most serious crises that this country has ever seen. I feel, however, that when I'm proposing the remonetization of silver that I am offering something which is more fundamental and far-reaching than anything that has yet been done. I say more fundamental because it will take men off the C.W.A. and put them back into legitimate enterprise; it will make it unnecessary to pay farmers not to produce, because it will open up new markets for their products; it will make it unnecessary to kill hogs and pigs for fertilizer, because it will provide money with which the unemployed can buy them.

No one can say we are suffering from overproduction of food and clothes when men, women, and children are going hungry.

What I seek to do is to give these people not a dole but the means with which to purchase our goods. I propose to double the primary money of the world, thereby doubling the currency, creating purchasing power where none exists today, and do it on a sound, stable basis. I would stabilize the currencies of the world on a bimetallic base and then we could open up the avenues of trade that have been clogged by quotas and tariffs.

More than 2 years ago, at the close of my speech in the Senate of the United States, I said:

"I assert and challenge intelligent criticism—not mere denial—of the following statements:

"First, the enactment of my bill into law would immediately thereafter nearly double the volume of the world's primary money, with the resultant increased conservative credit basis of 20 times the amount of primary money thus added to the world's stock.

"Second, Within 1 year after the enactment of this bill the world's price of wheat, cotton, and all agricultural products would be more than trebled.

"Third, The purchasing power of over 50 percent of the entire world's population now using silver as their sole yardstick of exchange and business transaction would contemporaneously be quadrupled; that is, the value of the silver stock would increase from 30 cents to $130, resulting in the creation of a market which would more than absorb all the surplus of our raw materials and manufactured products.

"Within 2 years all our present agricultural land values throughout the United States would be more than quadrupled, thereby transforming the present frozen assets of the country banks in agricultural communities into liquid assets.

"The unemployed-labor problem would be rapidly solved.

"Both capital and labor would be benefited.

"Contentment, happiness, and lucrative occupation would be substituted for discontentment and despair, with their inevitable resultant tragedies to follow.

"It would relieve starvation in the midst of plenty.

"This legislation would do more than all suggestions heretofore combined toward reviving, encouraging, vitalizing, and resuscitating business in this country and throughout the world.

"The market prices of securities, especially the common stocks of all corporations enjoying honest, efficient managements and being properly financed, where listed on some of the great stock exchanges of this country, would almost contemporaneously show increased activity and market value."

Since I made this declaration on the floor of the Senate no man has accepted the challenge and brought forth any valid reason or argument to show why the passage of my bill would not accomplish these things.

Questions have been raised, and some have expressed fears, but no argument has been brought forth that would tend to prove the unsoundness of my bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate nos. 1, 19, and 21 to the bill and concurred therein, and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate nos. 5 and 8 to the bill and concurred therein, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 2089. An act to amend the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3), relating to building-and-loan associations;

S. 2950. An act to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 7966. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On behalf of the committee, I desire to offer certain amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has certain committee amendments, the Chair understands, which he wishes to have considered by the Senate. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "50" and to insert in lieu thereof "75"; and on page 4, line 14, to strike out "5" and to insert in lieu thereof "8."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I send to the desk another amendment in behalf of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, after line 10, it is proposed to strike out subsection (f) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(f) A producer who harvests more cotton than his allotment may, in a subsequent year when the tax is in effect, and said producer does not harvest in said subsequent year the amount of cotton for which he holds allotment certificates, pay the ginning tax on said excess cotton with exemption certificates issued to him for said subsequent year.

A producer to whom a certificate of exemption is issued but not used during the crop year for which it is issued by reason of the producer to whom it was issued not producing as much cotton as his certificates of exemption covered, may use said certificate of exemption in any other year when the allotment and tax are made applicable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have another amendment of a clerical nature, which I present at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question to ascertain if I understand the amendment which was agreed to a moment ago. It had reference to the amount of tax that should be levied. Does the amendment increase the tax from 50 to 75 percent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. I now offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 12, after the word "transport", it is proposed to strike out the words "except for storing or warehousing under the provisions of section 4 (f)."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 23, page 22, it is proposed to strike out in lines 18 and 19 the words "500 pounds of lint cotton" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a package containing 500 pounds average gross weight."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. Also on page 3, line 17, after the word "thereon", it is proposed to strike out the following:

The provisions of this subsection shall apply with respect to the crop year 1936-37 in the same amount as in the case of the crop year 1935-36.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to have the attention of the author of the bill. On page 9, line 18, I wish to offer a further amendment to clarify the purpose. I read the entire text so it may be understood:

No certificate of exemption shall be issued and no allotment shall be made to any producer unless he agrees to comply with such conditions and limitations on the production of agricultural commodities by him as the Secretary of Agriculture may, from time to time, prescribe to assure the cooperation of such producer in the reduction programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and to prevent expansion of competitive production—

And so forth. After the word "expansion" I should like to insert the words "of lands leased by the Government", so that it would not take in all the lands of individuals.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SMITH. I offer the amendment. On page 9, at the beginning of line 18, after the word "expansion", insert the words "on lands leased by the Government."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I propose to insert at the proper place in the bill the following proviso:

Provided, In no event shall the producer be taxed or penalized in the ginning or otherwise on the first eight bales of 500 pounds weight.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Carolina proposes to insert at the proper place the following:

Provided, In no event shall the producer be taxed or penalized in the ginning or otherwise on the first eight bales of 500 pounds weight.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if I understand it correctly, the amendment, if agreed to, simply means that production may be increased in an unlimited way without tax. In other words, we might as well not pass the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, however that may be, I do not believe the Congress of the United States is going to deprive a million humble farmers, either in the South or elsewhere in our land, of the privilege of producing annually eight bales of cotton each. Eight bales of cotton at the present market price would amount to $480. That is $60 per bale. The farmer could not make a living at that rate, because the $480 is not profit. The $480 is gross income.

Let us look at the facts about this matter. There are 2,000,000 cotton farms in the 13 States comprising the Cotton Belt. Nine hundred thousand of those farms are cultivated by tenants, share tenants, cash tenants, or what we call "cropper tenants." The share tenants and the cropper tenants hold their tenure and cultivate their land on condition that they divide the crop with the landlord. If the tenant divides it half and half, that gives the 900,000 share tenants 4 bales each on the average, or $240 at present prices. But that is not profit; that is gross. Sometimes the crop is divided in thirds, all depending on who furnishes the stock and who furnishes the fertilizer, whether the tenant furnishes it all or whether it is furnished by the owner. But if the share tenant gets two thirds of $480, he would get $320. He would not be far above the level of Old World conditions if at all above it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. One thing that has worried me about this proposed legislation is whether, without some such provision as the Senator is proposing, we are not going to force a feudal condition in cotton production. That is one thing that has worried me about the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator that if the bill shall be passed there will be farmers in the South who have large plantations and who produce from 500 to 5,000 bales of cotton who will be able to stand it, and who, I will agree for the purposes of the argument, might profit by it. But what shall the Congress of the United States say to 900,000 families who make their living by way of producing cotton under the tenant system?

Mr. President, if there is going to be a limit upon the production of cotton, to be sure we will undertake to fix that limit in response to motives of simple humanity. They shall not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn. The bruised reed we will not break and the smoking flax we will not quench. Those who produce hundreds and thousands of bales of cotton can afford it; but I tell you in all earnestness that 900,000 of the humbler types—men like ourselves, men with the breath of God in their spirits, and made in His likeness, and only a little lower than the angels, notwithstanding their poverty; men like ourselves in humble condition, and therefore helpless—are entitled to the consideration of a Congress that professes to represent a civilized people.

This bill is inequitable. It is unjust. It is ruinous. If it should be enacted, and the Supreme Court should sustain it, the prophecy of the Secretary of Agriculture will come true, and a million human beings will have to move from the South.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, where did he say that?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator asks me where that was said. I stated yesterday that Mr. Secretary Wallace, in his rather famous pamphlet entitled "America Must Choose", in stating the theory of nationalism, went on to say that if this Government shall follow the policy of nationalism—and it has been following it recently more than it has any other line of action—we may have to move a million people from the South. That is what he said.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. LONG. I desire to profess my profound ignorance of the ethics of the Cabinet. Being a Senator, probably I ought to have paid more attention to a Cabinet member. I cannot believe my mind if that is correct, and the Secretary of Agriculture is going to move them out of the South.

Mr. BAILEY. He did not say that he would move them. He said it might be necessary to move them. The language was, "We may have to move them."

Mr. LONG. The South is the only place where the poor man can live the year around and not freeze to death, whether he can get anything to eat or wear or not. I do not understand how the Secretary of Agriculture could arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the South is a good place to live. I make no comparisons. Every man loves his native soil; but it seems to me that the Divine Providence laid off that land down there in order that those of us who had to come up through the great tribulation of a long poverty might come up unimpaired; and I would that we might say for the unemployed all over this land that they could do as our fathers and ourselves did in that long period of ruin and of prostration.

I have a letter here which I am going to ask to have printed in the RECORD. It is from Dr. Clarence Poe, editor of the Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist, published at Raleigh, Birmingham, Memphis, and Dallas. The letter is dated February 28. Dr. Poe has some title to represent the farmers. I know his whole life. He came from a little farm in Chatham County, in my State. He had, I think, some 6 months of free-school education. He created a great journal with over a million of circulation, and he could not have done it if he had not had, during all the long years since he has had charge of that paper—and it is now 36 years—the confidence of the farmers of the South.

I will read one paragraph:

At the same time, as I pointed out in my article, The Right of the Little Man to Live—

That is an editorial in his paper—

there ought to be a reasonable minimum below which we would not require a farmer to cut his acreage. This minimum ought to depend somewhat upon the number of persons in the farmer's immediate family. Probably no one who has been growing cotton or tobacco should be required to drop below 5 acres of tobacco or 8 bales of cotton.

I am not out of line with the foremost agricultural editor in the South when I offer this amendment.

Now that farmers have organized themselves and made cotton and tobacco decently profitable, I do not think that outsiders should be permitted to come in and oversupply the market. The young farmer who has just come of age, or the man who farmed up to 2 or 3 years ago and lost his farm through foreclosure, such cases should be taken care of by some such method as that of allowing the county committees to allot 5 or 10 percent of the total acreage of the county to deserving cases of this kind.

I ask to have the whole letter printed in the RECORD, and in perfect candor I want to say that Mr. Poe is for this legislation. I am not; but he is for my amendment, and that is where we get together.

I send the letter to the desk and ask to have it printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROGRESSIVE FARMER AND SOUTHERN RURALIST,
Raleigh, N.C., February 28, 1934.

Senator J. W. BAILEY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: I appreciate very much your thoughtful letter of February 26. I regretted missing you Saturday morning, and I was unable to get back later in the day.

My feeling is that growers of tobacco and cotton who will not cooperate in acreage reduction must positively be prevented from getting greater advantages from this acreage-reduction program than the cooperating growers themselves get—and, of course, if a farmer plants his full former acreage and at the same time gets the benefit in price from the reduced acreage of other growers, he would benefit more than the cooperating farmers themselves. This, I repeat, must be prevented.

At the same time, as I pointed out in my article The Right of the Little Man to Live, there ought to be a reasonable minimum below which we would not require a farmer to cut his acreage. This minimum ought to depend somewhat upon the number of persons in the farmer's immediate family. Probably no one who has been growing cotton or tobacco should be required to drop below 5 acres of tobacco or 8 bales of cotton. Now that farmers have organized themselves and made cotton and tobacco decently profitable, I do not think that outsiders should be permitted to come in and oversupply the market. The young farmer who has just come of age, or the man who farmed up to 2 or 3 years ago and lost his farm through foreclosure, such cases should be taken care of by some such method as that of allowing the county committees to allot 5 or 10 percent of the total acreage of the county to deserving cases of this kind. But I repeat that I do not think that persons without such a definite agricultural history should have allotments this year.

I was in Washington last week attending a conference of agricultural editors from all over the Nation—47 of them in all, with a combined subscription list of about 15,000,000. I was made chairman of the committee on resolutions, and these resolutions were unanimously adopted in the form of an open letter to President Roosevelt, Secretary Wallace, and Chester C. Davis. Friday afternoon we called on the President and presented these resolutions and on Saturday presented them to Secretary Wallace and Mr. Davis. It seems to me that they were of sufficient importance to have had the attention of the Associated Press, but so far as I know, have nowhere been published in full. It occurs to me that you may wish to consider putting them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

From the copy herewith please note section 6 of the Bankhead bill. When I called to see Senator BANKHEAD Saturday morning I found him very strongly opposed to a referendum this year, as he took the position that the questionnaire sent out by Secretary Wallace was sufficient to show that the farmers wanted this measure. I told him that I had no doubt in the world about farmers wanting the bill, but that the important thing is to extend the principles of our political democracy into our new economic democracy by having the adoption of the plan depend upon a direct vote, "consent of the governed." Every farmer who votes for the measure will feel that it is up to him to defend and justify the wisdom of his choice; in this way a strong supporting public opinion will be developed. On the other hand, if the plan is forced on the farmers by Congress or the administration, tens of thousands who favor the principle of the measure will nevertheless resent the method of adopting it.

Senator BANKHEAD thinks that the fact that cotton planting has started in Texas, etc., makes it too late for a referendum this year. But, with the measure dead sure to be approved if submitted by referendum, these early-planting cotton farmers can govern themselves accordingly and no harm will be done.

At the same time such a referendum should not be on the basis of a mail ballot but rather on the basis of a New England town meeting, which has been called the purest democracy in the world. Let the farmers come to community meetings, hear all the arguments pro and con, and then cast their ballots. With communication as fast as it is now, there is no reason why this should not be done on 10 days' notice.

Again thanking you for your letter, and with all good wishes, I am,

Yours sincerely,

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor.

Mr. BAILEY. I have here also some resolutions addressed to the President of the United States and signed by a committee composed of Clarence Poe, chairman; Dan A. Wallace, of The Farmer, St. Paul, Minn.; E. R. Eastman, of the American Agriculturist, New York, N.Y.; Clarence Roberts, of the Oklahoma Farmer-Stockman, Oklahoma City, Okla.; J. G. Watson, of the New England Homestead, Springfield, Mass.; and C. V. Gregory, of the Prairie Farmer, Chicago, Ill. While these resolutions support the principle of the bill, they also declare that nothing of this sort ought to be done without a reference to the farmers concerned, in order that their will may be ascertained.

I send the resolutions to the desk and ask that they be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., February 23, 1934.

HIS EXCELLENCY PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
HON. HENRY A. WALLACE, Secretary of Agriculture.
MR. CHESTER C. DAVIS, Chief of Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: The agricultural editors of America, meeting by request of the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of reviewing the activities and policies of the administration as they affect the welfare of American farmers and their families, respectfully beg leave to present a few fundamental principles we feel deserving of especial emphasis.

At the outset we desire to say that we appreciate the spirit of courage in which the Department of Agriculture and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration have met the difficult problems with which they have been faced—the willingness to dare and adventure and pioneer in order to achieve results.

At the same time we feel that there are certain fixed and definite objectives to which all pioneering should be directed, and we would summarize some of these as follows:

(1) We believe the supreme objective of the official agricultural efforts should be the preservation of the American farm home and the elevation of its living standards, and that in all cases of conflict between commercialized agriculture and the family (sized) farm the civic and social values of the farm home are so momentous that the influence of the Government should be used for its perpetuation and support. The weakening of the farm home would be too high a price to pay for lowered food costs of the American Nation.

(2) We believe that a continuing study of land utilization should be made, but with the primary concern for people rather than the land itself, and with results dependent chiefly upon voluntary action growing out of fuller information as to land values and potentialities. Both on the lands regarded as marginal and all others taxation and other governmental policies should be used to penalize the neglect of soil fertility and to reward its conservation.

(3) Efficiency of crop and animal production deserves no less emphasis now than in former years and should be matched with equal efficiency in farm marketing and business policies. The farmer in the past has had too much drudgery, too little leisure and recreation. Through constantly increasing efficiency and lowered production costs the farm family should be able to shorten its hours of labor and yet supply market needs, giving opportunity for more leisure and a richer social, intellectual, and community life.

(4) Under these new conditions the American farm home assumes enlarged dignity and opportunity. A Nation-wide campaign should be conducted to provide modern equipment and conveniences for all farm homes now without them, and we especially welcome proposals looking to more practicable and economical financing of their purchase. New outlets for industry and new opportunities for industrial reemployment would be largely afforded by better equipment of America's rural homes.

(5) While American farmers need and desire the active and powerful help of the Government in solving the gigantic problems confronting them, American agriculture cannot achieve proper dignity, nor can it be regarded as having really succeeded, no matter how great its financial prosperity may be, unless it has developed its own strong leadership, leading and interpreting an informed and organized rural public opinion. To this end, we believe that the administration should much more definitely foster and encourage the cooperative movement among farmers and should recognize and utilize all constructively minded farm organizations.

(6) Both as a proper recognition of the rights of farmers involved and for the purpose of securing that supporting public opinion so essential in democracy, it is our belief that measures involving major departures in farm practice, of which the Bankhead bill is an example, no matter how beneficent or patriotic in purpose, should be formally submitted for direct personal vote by the growers concerned.

(7) It is our conviction that neither American agriculture nor the American people as a whole can prosper adequately without perpetual effort to protect and enlarge our foreign markets; and to this end we urge that the utmost utilization be made of all practicable forms of reciprocity and international readjustment.

(8) We heartily approve the action of the President of the United States in calling for a general reduction of interest rates as both a justifiable and necessary aid to national business and agricultural recovery.

Unanimously approved by American Agricultural Editors Conference in Washington, February 23, 1934.

MR. BAILEY. Mr. President, on that point I am going to recur for a moment or two to the Constitution. I am perfectly satisfied that this bill is not only unconstitutional but so unconstitutional that the Supreme Court, whether it considers the matter economically or legalistically or juridically, will be compelled to throw it out. It happens that I am recurring to the theme of the constitutionality of the bill because I discovered since I spoke on yesterday two opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, relevant and apropos, handed down within the present year, 1934.

I shall read now from the unpublished opinion in Federal Compress & Warehouse Co. and others against McLean, to be reported in Two Hundred and Ninetieth United States Reports, and decided January 8, 1934, Mr. Justice Stone having written the opinion. He said:

It is clear that by all accepted tests the cotton—

Fortunately, we are not going to have to draw an analogy between cotton and some other product. The opinion is on the subject of cotton.

the cotton, while in appellant's warehouse, has not begun to move in interstate commerce and hence is not a subject of interstate commerce immune from local taxation.

There is the cotton that has been ginned. There is the cotton in the warehouse. There is the cotton ready for transportation; but the Supreme Court says that the cotton in the warehouse, after being picked and ginned, has not begun to move in interstate commerce and is not a subject of interstate commerce immune from local taxation.

When it comes to rest there, its intrastate journey, whether by truck or by rail, comes to an end; and although in the ordinary course of business the cotton would ultimately reach points outside the State, its journey interstate does not begin and so it does not become exempt from local tax until its shipment to points of destination outside the State. Before shipping orders are given, it has no ascertainable destination without the State, and in the meantime, until surrender of the warehouse receipts, it is subject to the exclusive control of the owner.

Now let me read again. Here is a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States dated March 12, 1934, just about 16 or 17 days ago, and written by Mr. Justice Brandeis. The title of the case is Chassaniol v. Greenwood. It is reported in Two Hundred and Ninety-first United States Reports, and the page has not yet been indicated. Says the opinion:

Chassaniol contends that all the cotton is in interstate or foreign commerce from the moment it leaves the gin for Greenwood (in Mississippi) or at least from the moment it is purchased at Greenwood by the buyer.

Realize, if you please, that the theory here is that the cotton is in interstate commerce, and this bill declares that it is prima facie in interstate commerce when it comes to the gin.

The argument is that already at that time the cotton is destined for ultimate shipment to some other State or country—

Precisely the argument here—and that to tax the occupation of the cotton buyer burdens interstate commerce, since the buyer at Greenwood is the instrumentality by which the interstate transaction is initiated. The business involved is substantially like that described in Federal Compress Co. v. McLean—

From which I have just read—and the rule there declared must govern here. Ginning cotton—

Let us be thankful that we are right on the point—

Ginning cotton, transporting it to Greenwood, and warehousing, buying, and compressing it there, are each, like the growing of it—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I will take 15 minutes more on my amendment, and then I will ask for more on the other amendments. I think that is the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment is the one pending.

Mr. LONG. The Senator may take 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I will speak on the bill for 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. The opinion I was reading continues:

Ginning cotton, transporting it to Greenwood, and warehousing, buying, and compressing it there, are each, like the growing of it, steps in preparation for the sale and shipment in interstate or foreign commerce. But each step prior to the sale and shipment is a transaction local to Mississippi; a transaction in intrastate commerce. Hence those engaged in performing any such local function may be subjected to an occupation tax, just as the property used, or processed, by them may be subjected to a property tax.

Mr. President, here are two opinions, handed down within the last 90 days, and each of them holds that cotton prior to its shipment in interstate commerce is governed by the State and is under the intrastate limitations with respect to the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

I do not know whether the authors of this bill were advertent to these opinions, almost precisely in point, or not; but I undertake to maintain that when a bill of this character is proposed here, within 16 or 17 days after an opinion by the Supreme Court, handed down by Mr. Justice Brandeis, it is, to say the least—and I say it most respectfully—in the nature of a total disregard of the guidance which we ought to look for from the Supreme Court of the United States as to the constitutionality of legislation.

I was saying yesterday that the pending bill could not be tested within 2 years; yet, with these decisions before the Congress and before the farmers, we are asked to pass a bill concerning which, as definitely as the Supreme Court could speak, under the circumstances, it has spoken in final and definitive terms.

Now, one other case, not on cotton. I read from United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U.S. 1):

Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce. If the national power extends to all contracts and combinations in manufacture, agriculture, mining, and other productive industries whose ultimate result may affect external commerce, comparatively little of business operations and affairs would be left for State control.

Mr. President, that is not just some man making a speech in the Senate; that is a declaration of the Supreme Court, and in the light of which we are acting here.

But let me read again, this time an opinion handed down by Mr. Justice McKenna in the case of Heisler v. The Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U.S. Repts), the date being as recent as 1922:

If the possibility or, indeed, certainty of exportation of a product or articles from a State determines it to be in interstate commerce before the commencement of its movement from the State, it would seem to follow that it is in such commerce from the instant of its growth or production; and in the case of coals, as they lie in the ground. The result would be curious. It would nationalize all industries.

"It would nationalize all industries." The words are prophetic.

It would nationalize and withdraw from State jurisdiction and deliver to Federal commercial control the fruits of California and the South, the wheat of the West and its meats, the cotton of the South, the shoes of Massachusetts, and the woolen industries of other States, at the very inception of their production or growth; that is, the fruits unpicked, the cotton and wheat ungathered, hides and flesh of cattle yet on the hoof, wool yet unshorn, and coal yet unmined, because they are, in varying percentages, destined for and surely to be exported to States other than those of their production.

Here are recent cases which cannot leave a doubt, in my mind, and which I do not think can leave a doubt in anyone's mind—but I say that with great respect—of the unconstitutionality of the pending measure.

Mr. President, I did not intend to delay the Senate this morning or to speak further. On yesterday I spoke at some length on the liberty aspects of the proposed legislation. I am going to conclude now with a word or two on the economic aspect of it.

The South no longer has a monopoly in the production of cotton. We produce about 13,000,000 bales annually, the rest of the world produces 12,000,000 annually, and the rest of the world increased its production last year by 1,600,000 bales.

I do not think it is a matter for dispute that in Africa, off the dam at Assuan, England has 12,000,000 acres of land under irrigation and ready to put it into cotton. In India England has 15,000,000 acres of land ready to put into cotton. For 30 years the foreign production has been increasing from six and a half million bales a year until it has reached nearly double that amount, or 12,000,000 bales.

Let the National Government, assuming it can, give its orders and impose its penalties to cut off the production of cotton in the South; the whole effect will be to increase the production abroad, to deprive America of its great export crop, and to leave 13 American States in helpless competition with tens of millions of acres under cheap labor throughout the world.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Senator if he is aware that cotton can be grown 10 degrees farther north in China than in the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. I have so understood. But I have been very recently informed that Great Britain is holding in reserve and under irrigation 12,000,000 acres in the Nile Valley and in India 15,000,000 acres, awaiting the hour when the Congress of the United States shall put chains upon 2,000,000 farmers, bind them helplessly while the world takes the market that has supported them for a full century.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is now discussing a phase of the subject I have not as yet heard discussed. It was suggested to me by an expert that the operation of the reduction program could not affect seriously the domestic grower or manufacturer, but if there was any advantage taken of it at all it would be in the export or foreign countries. Has the Senator given any consideration to that phase of the question?

Mr. BAILEY. I have given a great deal of consideration to it. For 30 solid years I have heard the old, familiar statement that the South had a monopoly of cotton, and year after year, for 30 years, I have seen the nations of the earth increase their output, until today, I think, the statistics will show the South produces 52 percent and the balance of the world 48 percent. I have heard, again, that nowhere else save in the Southern States can acceptable cotton be produced; that we produce cotton the like of which no one else can produce. But at the same time, I have seen the cotton from other lands constantly expanding its market, and at the expense of cotton from our Southern States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. May I now not have the 15 minutes on an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. BAILEY. I will offer one, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is necessary for me to be absent from the Senate for an hour or two on the business of the Senate, and before leaving I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent. I have consulted with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and I understand the request meets his approval.

The request is that after the pending bill shall have been disposed of the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I shall object to unanimous consent until there is something done about the bonus bill. The bonus bill has passed the House. We have been trying to get it placed in a position where it may be voted on by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed, he will say to the Senator from Louisiana, that the bill in question was referred to the Finance Committee yesterday.

Mr. LONG. I did not so understand. I was not here at the time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I submit the request for unanimous consent that after the pending bill shall have been disposed of the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I send forward two amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me just a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I realize, Mr. President, that there are many things that may be said touching various phases of the pending bill; but in relation to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which I understand is the pending question—

Mr. BAILEY. And which, I think, was adopted; was it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not so understand.

Mr. LONG. Yes; it has been agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, what was the question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement was that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. President; it was not agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. There was a vote had, and I think the Vice President was in the chair at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that occurred prior to the taking of the chair by the present occupant; but the Chair is informed by the clerk that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina has been agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I knew that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was trying to get recognition; and he had stated to me that he desired to state his position in opposition to the amendment. I presume the Senator from North Carolina will not object to reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. I am perfectly willing that the vote be reconsidered. I give the Senator from Arkansas full assurance as to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement about the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt to say that I will hold the floor in order to answer the question of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]; but I desire to hold the floor while I am in my seat.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thought perhaps the Senator had better let me use my own time, and save for himself as much time as the Senator has left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from North Carolina that he cannot hold the floor and proceed after the Senator from Arkansas has concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understood the Senator from North Carolina had consumed all the time he has for the present, until another amendment shall be offered.

Mr. BAILEY. I have sent forward two amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but the pending question is on the first amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I do not wish to raise any technical question about the matter, but merely to state my position on the first amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Inasmuch, Mr. President, as the average production of cotton, I understand, is seven bales per cotton farmer, or less, it seems to me that the incorporation of the Senator's amendment would defeat all or the greater part of what the bill seeks to do. I do not believe the amendment should be agreed to by those who are in sympathy with the proposed legislation.

The incorporation of an amendment which would permit every cotton farmer in the United States to grow eight bales which would be tax free would mean that at least 16,000,000 bales could be grown and sent into commerce without the payment of any tax, and as that is a larger crop than usually is grown, and a much larger production than is contemplated by the bill, I think the amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. That would not be effective in the way the Senator says if the crop-production program were put on a basis so as to protect the small producer and let the big producer suffer the reduction.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think it would, for the reason I have just stated. Inasmuch as there are more than 2,000,000 cotton producers in the United States, that of itself, assuming the maximum production as to each farmer, would mean an aggregate production of 16,000,000 bales or more, and if the annual cotton crop is to be placed at that amount, it is utterly useless, as I see it, to pass the bill.

That is all I wish to say on this subject.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I understand my time is up. I wish to make my apologies to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] for not being able, on account of the rules of the Senate, to respond fully to a very interesting question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I move to amend the amendment of the senior Senator from North Carolina by changing the figure "8" to "6", so as to make the amount stated in the amendment 6 bales instead of 8 bales.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from North Carolina for that purpose?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to the amendment of the senior Senator from

North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], to strike out "8" and insert "6."

Mr. LONG. I understand the junior Senator from North Carolina has moved to cut the per farmer allowance to 6 bales instead of 8 bales. Is that the amendment?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall accept that amendment, and I ask the clerk to make the change on the amendment from "8" to "6."

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has the floor. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will pretermit for a moment the question I was about to ask.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I agree with other Senators who have expressed the opinion that the bill is unconstitutional. It seems to me, if there be any Constitution left, that must be so.

I was particularly interested in the analysis made by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] as to the length of time it would take a cotton grower to get the question before the courts. That, to my mind, is a very serious matter. I agree with him also when he says that this proposed legislation goes further than any legislation enacted during the past year. To my mind it is the most dangerous of all and starts us upon a path the end of which no man can see.

Mr. President, I have observed from this discussion the following facts:

America produces about 54 percent of the world's supply of cotton. We consume in this country about 40 percent of the American production. Our consumption, therefore, amounts to 21.6 percent of the total production. We export 32.4 percent of the total production, and the balance of 46 percent is produced in other countries. Last year 10,000,000 acres were removed from production by means of contracts under the A.A.A. at a cost to the American citizens of $100,000,000; this year it is proposed to remove 15,000,000 acres, or 40 percent, from production at an estimated cost of $135,000,000. The reduction in acreage last year at a cost of $100,000,000 was not effective, and the amount produced was about the same as was produced the previous year, namely, 13,000,000 bales. It is now proposed to put a prohibitive tax on all cotton produced in excess of 10,000,000 bales.

The American consumer has been taxed for the benefit of the cotton producer. We can all understand how much the cotton grower would be interested in that tax. What we will have difficulty in explaining is why the cotton grower wants us to impose a tax of 75 percent upon all the cotton he grows above a specified amount. It is an anomaly in American politics. We have been assured that the author of the bill is depending upon the taxing power of Congress to sustain its constitutionality. It therefore becomes a revenue measure. The very fact that the request for a tax is presented by one who is so much interested in the persons who produce the commodity, is sufficient answer to the suggestion that it is for the purpose of raising revenue. It is special legislation for a special class; and, more than that, it is made compulsory upon at least a minority of that class who do not want it. It is an endeavor to control an agricultural commodity, the successful growth of which depends upon the character of the soil, the fertilizer used, the skill in planting and cultivating, and last, but not least, the weather conditions prevailing during the period of its growth. Think of having lived long enough to see legislation of this character seriously considered by the Congress of the United States.

This proposed legislation has no kin to the depression. The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], an acknowledged authority, calls attention to the fact that 43,000,000 acres produced 14,000,000 bales in 1929, while 38,000,000 acres produced 17,000,000 bales in 1931. This was about 5,000,000 bales more than the average consumption.

It thus appears that, while this bill is, like most acts placed on the statute books in these days, enacted in the name of emergency, it is, in fact, nothing more than another plan to further the idea of the present administration of planning for both industry and the farmer, and the operation of both from Washington.

Why do we not give one new scheme an opportunity to work before we try another? The $100,000,000 we gave the cotton farmer last year was not enough; the plan did not work. Now we propose to give him $135,000,000 this year. It may be that will work. We have reduced the gold content of the dollar to 59 cents, and the President may reduce it to 50 cents. We have been assured that this has increased the price of farm products. The N.R.A. was supposed to do the same thing. The new tariff bill recommended by the President it is supposed will also help. We have been assured by all who speak for the administration that business has greatly improved and that the improvement is growing rapidly.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator taking that as a basis for his argument, that business has materially improved?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I am pointing out that, if it is improving as rapidly as is contended, we ought to stop some of this dangerous legislation.

Mr. LONG. But does not the Senator know, in his mind and heart, that that is not so?

Mr. HASTINGS. That what is not so?

Mr. LONG. That business has improved materially?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not care to comment upon that. I do not think it has greatly improved, but we all hope that it will soon improve.

If these things be true, we ought to let up a little with these new experiments. We ought to let some of the irons cool before we place more in the fire. We ought to remember that these experiments affect about 125,000,000 people. We ought not to gamble with their welfare. We should be reasonably certain that the plan will work before adopting it. We should have some idea of where we are going before we start; and, if it be a new place and a new route, we should try to find some well-known American principles to serve as guideposts. We cannot safely leave the Federal Constitution and hope to retain our Republican form of government. More than that, we ought not to try to devise some scheme of avoiding the Constitution by using the taxing power, as is proposed in this bill, as a subterfuge to accomplish some other purpose. The taxing power is an essential power. We are using it now to the distress of many and we will be compelled to use it in the future so drastically that it will seriously affect every class of our citizens. Let us not abuse that power, hoping that the Supreme Court will sustain us.

We are told that 46 percent of all the cotton produced is produced in foreign countries. I wonder whether the passage of this bill would not increase the production abroad? I am also wondering what effect this reduction is to have upon the unemployed in the South. What is to happen to the man in the South who has spent his life in tilling a few acres of cotton?

I have seen, time and again in my State, energetic and skillful farmers caring for their orchards. I have seen the crop so affected by frost or cold weather as to result in no crop at all. On the other hand, I have seen the crop so large and the price so low that it was not worth gathering. In both instances the farmer sustained a great loss and a great disappointment. I have never heard it suggested until recently that these situations, these hardships, could be relieved by legislation, either State or Federal. Why do we try to fool ourselves, to fool the farmers by this kind of bunk?

The majority party had better call a halt before it is too late. Notwithstanding the statement of Mr. Farley that the new deal is merely following the 1932 Democratic platform, I think when the American people even casually canvass the legislation which has been and which will be enacted they will see that the new deal and the Democratic platform have no relation to each other. The American people have not by their votes approved more than two or three of the major things that have been done. I say, they have not approved by their votes. I do not say they do not approve; I do not know. I do think the successful propaganda for this administration makes them seem to approve. But the mere fact that this administration was given control of the Government by a large majority does not give it a license to fasten upon the people a lot of costly experiments. As late as September 14, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt, speaking of his farm plan, said:

The plan must not be coercive; it must be voluntary, and the individual producer at all times shall have the opportunity of nonparticipation if he so desires.

What we have done and what we are about to do leaves the business man, the farmer, and the wage earner in so uncertain a position that we shall, in my judgment, find this country at the tail end of world recovery.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, may I inquire whether there is an amendment now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], as modified, is pending.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will take time on the amendment, and also on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will have half an hour.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, this bill is presumed to be supplemental to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which has been previously passed. I think we ought to take into account some of the things that have been happening in the past few months, and then decide whether or not we are pursuing a safe course in proposing to enact this legislation.

In the House hearings, on page 139, I note this letter sent to Mr. JONES, Chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the House:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 16, 1934.

HON. MARVIN JONES,
Committee on Agriculture,
The Capitol, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As you know, I have watched the cotton problem with the deepest attention during all these months. I believe that the gains which have been made—and they are very substantial—must be consolidated, and, insofar as possible, made permanent. To do this, however, reasonable assurance of crop limitation must be obtained.

In this objective the great majority of cotton farmers are in agreement. I am told that the present poll by the Department of Agriculture shows that at least 95 percent of the replies are in favor of some form of control.

My study of the various methods suggested leads me to believe that the Bankhead bills in principle best cover the situation. I hope that in the continuing emergency your committee can take action.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

I invite attention to that statement, and then I invite attention to a statement made on September 14, 1932, when the people were being asked to change the political leadership in the country. At Topeka, Kans., the outline of the farm plan by President Roosevelt, then Democratic nominee for the Presidency, was given, and in his six-point program no. 4 was as follows:

Fourth. It must make use of existing agencies and, so far as possible, be decentralized in its administration, so that the chief responsibility for its operation will rest with locality rather than with newly created bureaucratic machinery in Washington.

I invite attention to the fact that there have never been as many new bureaus and as much centralized control or such an effort to have centralized control as is included in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, already a law, and in the present Bankhead bill as supplemental legislation therefor. In other words, under the Bankhead bill we are coming to where we are asking that everything be regulated clear down to the type of crop, the acreage to be planted, whether or not we may use additional fertilizer, what we shall do with the land after it is taken out of cultivation, whether or not we are going to limit the number of sows that may be farrowed, the number of acres of corn that may be planted. All of that is going to be regimented under bureaucratic control in Washington, D.C.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The dangerous trend of the movement about which the Senator is talking, it seems to me, lies in the rapid increase from one step to another, at first mild, then a second and then a third and then a fourth, each progressively less mild. Is it not true the President spoke definitely against compulsory control?

Mr. DICKINSON. Absolutely. I have further quotations here about that very point.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that Secretary Wallace has never been in favor of it?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is true.

Mr. FESS. What is the explanation of the drift we are taking, and what will be the end of it?

Mr. DICKINSON. The best explanation is the fact that this Government has led everybody to believe that they ought to bring their troubles to Washington and lay them on the front doorsteps of the White House. I shall show before I get through the amount of money they have sought in order to convince the people that the Government is going to do everything for them that they ought to be doing in their own behalf. As one Democratic Congressman said the other day—I do not know his name—"I voted for the Bankhead bill because I want to be reelected in 1934, but it will mean my defeat in 1936."

The temperament is such that the administration is leading the people to where they think the Government will do everything for them and that is the serious danger of the whole situation. It is the reason why there is a growing fear all along the line that we are leading the Government into fields where it cannot retract and that in the end it will be destroyed if we go much further.

Referring to the agricultural conference, President Roosevelt said in his Topeka speech:

It took the amazing position—

That means the Federal Farm Board, because he was talking about the former administration.

It took the amazing position that production should be reduced to the demands of the domestic market by the cheerful means, it appeared, of starving out the farmers who had formerly exported to Europe.

And yet what is proposed here? Not only are we going to limit the acreage, but if the producers raise more than the total of 10,000,000 bales of cotton we are going to confiscate the excess by taxation. No such use of the taxing power was ever before made. The right to tax has always been said to be the right to destroy. Here is a situation where it is said by the administration, "Go down on your farm. Plow your acres. Plant your field. But if you raise a little more than some bureaucratic chief in Washington thinks you ought to raise, we are going to confiscate it and take it away from you. Breed your sows for farrowing, but if 10 sows average 8 pigs apiece, when they are only entitled to have 6, we will confiscate the other 2." Out in the Midwestern States, where the Presiding Officer [Mr. NORRIS] and I live, a pig is almost a member of the family, and to say that we are going to confiscate hogs and have 6,000,000 more of them die in vain is absolutely repulsive to the pork producers of the country all along the line.

What further did the President say? Remember this was only in 1932. These were the platform pledges upon which Mr. Roosevelt was asking the votes of the people in order to carry out the great recovery program which has been inaugurated. In criticism of the Farm Board, he said further:

When the futility of maintaining prices of wheat and cotton, through so-called "stabilization", became apparent, the Farm Board . . . invented the cruel joke of advising farmers to allow 20 percent of their wheat lands to lie idle, to plow up every third row of cotton, and to shoot every tenth dairy cow.

A cruel joke, and yet we are here enacting into law, under the leadership of the present administration, exactly that thing and also saying "in case you happen to have a little surplus, we will take it away from you by this grand old process of the taxing power."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In the face of millions of people who are undernourished, in the face of equally as many millions of people who are without raiment, cotton or otherwise, and in view of the further fact that we are making expenditures of millions of dollars for the purpose of absolutely destroying clothing and food, and in particular reference to cotton, the subject in which we are now interesting ourselves, does not the Senator think that the Government would save a great deal of money if we would now encourage the return of the boll weevil and the corn borer? A number of years ago we spent millions of dollars—

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest that I do not want the Senator to take my time. I am limited, he will remember.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am going to speak in a little while and I shall be glad to give the Senator part of my time. [Laughter.] We spent millions of dollars in arresting the boll weevil which was destroying the cotton. Now we are about to spend millions of dollars to do the very thing we asked the boll weevil not to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. I concur in the thought expressed by the Senator.

I want to go further with this quotation. I did not get through with it all:

Surely they knew that this advice would not, indeed, could not, be taken.

Oh, but it is not advice any more. It is no longer a voluntary program of cooperation which they asked of the farmer under the other measure. No; it is coercion now. They are going to recommend everything from Washington clear down and put on the farmer's fence post a sign reading, "This man is entitled to plant so many acres of cotton. If he raises any more than that, if the Lord happens to send him a favorable season, we are going to confiscate over and above so many bales and take it away from him by the old-fashioned plan of the taxing power."

Roosevelt further said:

It was probably offered as the foundation of an alibi. They wanted to be able to say to the farmers: "You did not do as we told you to do. Blame yourselves."

As a matter of fact, what did the farmers do? They cut down their acreage under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, it is true, and raised just as much cotton as they did before. The reason for all this uncertainty is the fact that the limitation asked by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] does not determine the amount of the crop. In other words, there are so many phases of the whole scheme that are so uncertain, that are not dependable in the doing of the things it is claimed will be done, that they absolutely will not control the price equation.

I believe if the truth were told, we would have to admit that the increase in the price of cotton now is largely due to the fact that we deflated our dollar, or we brought about inflation to the point where the Japanese yen would buy about twice as much cotton as it formerly bought, and therefore we have had an increase in the exports to European markets.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, would the Senator from Iowa object if in order to decrease the hog supply we propagated hog cholera, and in order to decrease the cattle supply we propagated the cattle worm, and in order to reduce the cotton supply we propagated the pink boll worm? Perhaps we on the two sides might get together on something of that kind.

Mr. DICKINSON. If we are going to have any Government proposals like this one, I am not sure but that I would rather have something that I know will be certain in its effect. What is going to happen here is that we are going to spend all kinds of money, and in the end it will not bring about the desired result; and I am going to show in a little while the facts as to the expenditure of some of this money.

Senators talk about the cotton situation. In 1919 the cotton crop of this country was worth a little over $2,000,000,000. In 1923 it was worth a little over a billion and a half. In 1928 it was worth a little over a billion and a third. In 1932 it was worth a little over $397,000,000; and the crop for the present year, 1933, is worth about $485,000,000.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] tried to show here yesterday that the cotton situation is different from the situation of practically any other type of farm commodity. I do not know anything about cotton, so far as the crop is concerned. I can read figures. I can see what the crop is. I find, as I have stated, that there is a decrease from $2,000,000,000 in 1919 to approximately $400,000,000 in 1932.

Now let us take corn. The corn crop in 1917 was worth $4,000,000,000. In 1932 it was worth $566,000,000. In other words, we have had a larger percentage of decrease in dollar return in the corn crop than we have in cotton. In a little while I will insert some amazing statistics as to what has been done with reference to benefits to cotton and with reference to other commodities.

Take wheat. In 1919 the wheat crop was worth $2,000,000,000. In 1932 it was worth $254,000,000. For the present year, 1933, it is worth $395,000,000.

In other words, the decrease in every one of these commodities is in excess of the decrease in cotton. Therefore, cotton is not an exception to the general rule.

But let us go further than that. You can go into any line of endeavor in the United States and find the same thing. I can take you into cities and show you 15 or 20 stories on the top of office buildings that have never been opened up. Why? Because there are no tenants for them. The builders produced too much office space. I suppose what the Government ought to do is to go out and rent that office space, just as we are going to say here that we are going to rent land if the owners will let it lie idle or take it out of crop production.

Why is not the man who honestly went ahead and erected an office building, or constructed store buildings, or built hotels or apartment houses entitled to his return, just the same as anybody else?

What I am trying to show is that this type of remedy does not reach the real situation, and therefore is not practical, and will not be effective.

I suggest that Senators read the hearings with reference to the confidence that the Secretary of Agriculture has in this control. He says that he does not want to restrict the crop unless the farmers are willing to cooperate; and yet we have a tax here by which it is going to be coercive, not cooperative. On the other hand, we find that cooperation under the Agricultural Adjustment Act has not brought about the desired result and is not going to bring it about. Therefore, we are simply flying off on another tangent that will not do the things that we desire to do.

Oh, yes; a processing tax is to be imposed. All this money is to be paid back by a processing tax; and the advocates of the bill say that the processing tax is going to do the very things that they suggest here all along the line, and all this money is going to be paid back into the Federal Treasury.

Up until the 22d day of March the processing tax brought in $235,476,841.86. For the entire month of March up to that date the total collections were a little over $34,000,000. It will be necessary to collect at least 60 percent more processing tax than is now being collected in order to come anywhere near meeting the demand so far as balancing the expenditures is concerned.

The estimated output for the year 1934 is $855,000,000. The processing tax to date has reached a little bit over 25 percent of that, and the big part of that is the processing tax that was levied on the stocks on hand at the time the tax was put into effect.

What is the trouble with this whole thing? The fact is that the processing tax is merely a matter of locking the whole machinery; that is all. When the processing tax is put on it reflects itself in the price of the commodity. Textiles go higher if they are made out of cotton. Therefore people buy less, and when they buy less there is less use for cotton, and therefore the whole process simply locks itself. When the processing tax is applied to pork what is done? One of two things. Either it is taken out of what is paid to the farmer who raised the hogs or it is taken out of the consumer. The best evidence I can find is that about 70 percent of the processing tax is now paid by the farmer who produces the hog, and only 30 percent of it is passed on. When the farmers begin to pass it on what happens? Why, the consumers simply use a substitute meat. Yet Congress has now permitted a processing tax to be levied on meats. It is permitting it to be levied on peanuts. It is permitting it to be levied on all kinds of different grains, like barley, rye, and so forth; and Congress is now going to permit the processing tax to be levied on all the commodities that are described in the conference report that is now pending here.

I do not know why in the world we should not stop, look, and listen, because the processing tax is simply the brake by which we are attempting to secure benefits, but in the end it is a detriment to the whole interest of the commodity on which it is levied. It has proven so in the case of pork. It has proven so in the case of cotton. It will prove more so as time goes on; and yet this is the program upon which we have entered. It is a program that I believe in the end will wreck itself unless we as a Congress stop it before it goes too far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. He may speak now on the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will take my time on the bill.

In order that Senators may understand just what has been done, I advise every Senator to get a copy of the report on the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act from May 1933 to February 1934. It contains an amazing lot of information. In order that Senators may understand it, I desire to read a little comment with reference thereto from yesterday's New York Times. It is very illuminating:

In its effort to improve farm prices the A.A.A. has initiated crop-curtailment plans in the case of tobacco, corn, and hogs, as well as wheat and cotton, and has similar plans in preparation for other farm commodities.

Those are the commodities to which I have just referred.

It recognizes the criticism frequently made of these activities, that it is attempting to curtail the production of food and materials for clothing precisely at a time when many people go hungry or are poorly clothed. But it insists that, paradoxically, farm surpluses are in themselves one cause of city bread lines, since such surpluses drive down farm prices, destroy the purchasing power of rural communities, curtail their orders for city goods and close down factories and mines.

If the processing tax is taken out of the price paid to the farmer, remember that not only is that being done but it is being done more viciously, and at a higher rate, than if things were permitted to take their natural course.

Both for this reason, and because the tariff war in which all nations are engaged has greatly restricted foreign trade, the A.A.A. believes that a substantial reduction of output is essential if American agriculture is to be placed on a sound basis. Only one of its curtailment plans has as yet been put to a test. Last autumn southern planters took 10,000,000 acres of cotton out of production, but cultivated so intensively what remained that (favored also by good weather) the estimated crop exceeded that of the preceding year.

To farmers who agree to curtail their acreage, cash benefits are paid. Detailed accounts of these are given in the present report. They show, up to the end of 1933, total payments of $131,000,000 to producers of wheat, cotton, and tobacco in 44 States. Some interesting contrasts appear when these figures are analyzed on a geographical basis. Thus the six New England States—

I want the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] to hear this:

Thus the six New England States have received a total of $252,000. But six Southern States—Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas—have received $95,332,000. On a per capita basis, the share of these Southern States is 177 times as large as that of the New England group. These figures suggest the redistribution of wealth—

I am sure the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is listening—

These figures suggest the redistribution of wealth, which is now in progress as a means of correcting the earlier disparity.

In order that Senators may understand this fully, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in my remarks, exhibit no. 6, found at page 296 of the report on the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, showing the benefits and the amount paid to each State. The total is $181,207,519.80.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the exhibit will be printed in the RECORD.
